MARY OF BURGUNDY THE REVOLT OF CHENT.

LONDON: FREDERICK WARNE & CO

NOTABLE NOVELS. COMPLETE EDITIONS.

	Large crown 8vo, Sixpence each, Picture Wrappers.
4		Miss JANE PORTER.
1	SCOTTISH CHIEFS.	HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.
2	ONOLL TOM S CADIN.	ELIZABETH HELME.
3	ST. CLAIR OF THE ISLES.	E. M. Roche.
4	CHILDREN OF THE ABBEY.	Miss Cummins.
5	THE LAMPLIGHTER.
6	MABEL VAUGHAN.	Miss Cummins.
7	THADDEUS OF WARSAW.	Miss Porter.
8	THE HOWARDS OF GLEN LUNA.	Miss Warner.
9	THE OLD ENGLISH BARON, &c. &c.	CLARA REEVE.
10	THE HUNGARIAN BROTHERS.	Miss Porter.
11	MARRIAGE.	Miss Ferrier.
12	INHERITANCE.	Miss Ferrier.
13	DESTINY.	MISS FERRIER.
14	THE KING'S OWN.	Captain MARRYAT.
15	THE NAVAL OFFICER.	Captain MARRYAT.
16	NEWTON FORSTER,	Captain MARRYAT.
17	RICHELIEU.	G. P. R. JAMES.
18	DARNLEY.	G. P. R. JAMES.
19	PHILIP AUGUSTUS.	G. P. R. JAMES.
20	TOM CRINGLE'S LOG.	MICHAEL SCOTT.
		Captain MARRYAT.
21	PETER SIMPLE.	G. P. R. JAMES.
22	MARY OF BURGUNDY.	Captain MARRYAT.
23	JACOB FAITHFUL.	G. P. R. JAMES.
24	THE GIPSY.	M. Scott.
25	CRUISE OF THE MIDGE.	R. H. DANA.
26	TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST.
27	THE PIRATE, and THE THREE CUTT	ERS. Capt. MARRYAT.
28	HENRY MASTERTON.	G. P. R. JAMES.
29	JOHN MARSTON HALL.	G. P. R. JAMES.
30	JAPHET IN SEARCH OF A FATHER.	Captain MARRYAT.
31	THE WOLF OF BADENOCH.	SIR THOMAS DICK LAUDER.
32	CALEB WILLIAMS.	WILLIAM GODWIN.
33	THE PACHA OF MANY TALES.	Captain MARRYAT.
34	THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.	OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
35	MR. MIDSHIPMAN EASY.	Captain MARRYAT.
36	ATTILA.	G. P. R. JAMES.
37	RORY O'MORE.	S. Lover.
38	PELHAM.	LYTTON BULWER.
	THE DISOWNED.	LYTTON BULWER.
39		LYTTON BULWER.
40	DEVEREUX.	LYTTON BULWER.
41	PAUL CLIFFORD.	LYTTON BULWER.
42	EUGENE ARAM.	LYTTON BULWER.
43	THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII.	LYTTON BULWER.
44	RIENZI.	LYTTON BULWER.
45	ERNEST MALTRAVERS.
46	STORIES OF WATERLOO.	W. H. MAXWELL.
47	THE BIVOUAC: OR, STORIES OF THE	W II W.
	PENINSULAR WAR.	W. H. MAXWELL.

THE CHANDOS CLASSICS.

A SERIES OF STANDARD WORKS IN POETRY, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, THE DRAMA, &c.

In large crown 8vo, price 1s. 6d. each, stiff wrapper; or cloth gilt, 2s.

Shakspeare. Complete. Longfellow's Poetical Works. Byron's Poetical Works. Scott's Poetical Works. With Notes. Arabian Nights (The).

Eliza Cook's Poems. Complete Edition. Legendary Ballads of England and Scotland.

Burns' Poetical Works. Johnson's Lives of the Poets. Dante: Vision. Translated by CARY. Moore's Poetical Works.

Dr. Syntax's Three Tours. With

Coloured Portrait.

Butler's Hudibras. With Notes by ZACHABY GREY. Cowper's Poetical Works.

Milton's Poetical Works. Wordsworth's Poetical Works. Twice-Told Tales. By HAWTHORNE. Hallam's Constitutional History

of England. History of the Saracens. By GIBBON and OCKLEY.

Robinson Crusoe. Unabridged. Swiss Family Robinson. Including

Sequel. With Illustrations. Mrs. Hemans' Poetical Works.

Grimm's Fairy Tales.

Dodd's Beauties of Shakspeare. Andersen's (Hans) Fairy Tales. Scott's Lives of Eminent Novelists

and Dramatists. Scott's Essays Chivalry,

Romance, and the Drama. Shelley's Poetical Works. Campbell's Poetical Works.

Keats' Poetical Works. Coleridge's Poetical Works. Pope's Iliad. With FLAXMAN'S Illustrations. Pope's Odyssey. With Flaxman's Illustrations, Good's Poetical Works.

Representative Actors. By W. CLARK . RUSSELL.

Ingland. (Romance of History.) HENRY NEALE. Illustrations by T. LANDSEER. France. (Romance of History.) By LEITCH RITCHIE. Illustrations by T. LANDSBEE.

Italy. (Romance of History.) By C.
MACFARLANE. Illustrations by T. LANDSBEB. Spain. (Romance of History.) By Don T. de Trueba. Illustrations by J. K. Meadows.

India. (Romance of History.) By Rev.

HOBART CAUNTER, B.D.
German Literature, as exemplified by the Works of TIECK, RICHTER, and ZSCHOKKE. Don Quixote, The Life and Adventures of. By CERVANTES.

Eastern Tales. Edited by Mrs. VALENTINE.

Mackay's Complete Works. Goldsmith's Poems and Plays.

Pope's Poetical Works.

The Koran. Complete. Oxenford's French Songs, &c.

Gil Blas, The Adventures of.

The Talmud. By H. POLANO.

Virgil (Dryden's), The Works of. Clare's Remains.

Romance of London-Historic, &c. Romance of London—Supernatural, &c.

A Century of Anecdote.

Book of Authors. Walton and Cotton's Angler.

George Herbert's Poetical Works. Bishop Heber's Poetical Works. Half-Hours with the Best

Authors. Ditto

Ditto * * * * Ditto

Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Fugitive Poetry. 1600-1878.

Pepys' Diary. Evelyn's Diary.

Townsend's Modern Literature.* Ditto Ditto

Montgomery (James). Spenser's Faery Queen.

White's Natural History of Selborne.

Keble's Christian Year. Lamb's Poems and Essays.

HE CHANDOS OLASSICS.

A SERIUS OF STANDARD WORKS IN PORTRY, BIOGRAPHY, HISTORY, THE DRAWA, &.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2025 with funding from University of Toronto

Spensor's Farry Queen

MARY OF BURGUNDY;

OR,

The Revolt of Chent.

By G. P. R. JAMES.

AUTHOR OF "THE GIPSY," "DARNLEY," "RICHELIEU," ETC.

'Thou wouldst be great,
Art not without ambition, but without
The illness should attend it. What thou wouldst highly
That thou wouldst holily; wouldst not play false,
And yet wouldst wrongly win.'—MACBETH.

LONDON:
FREDERICK WARNE AND CO.,
BEDFORD STREET, STRAND.

MARY OF BURGUNDY;

OR,

The Aevolt of Chemi.

By G. P. R. JAMES.

AUTHOR OF "THE GIPSY," "DARNLEY," "RICHELIEO," ETC.

'Thou wouldst be great,
Art not without ambition, but without
The illness should attend it. What thou wouldst highly
That thou wouldst boily; wouldst not play false,
And yet wouldst wrongly win.'—MACRETH.

LONDON:

FREDERICK WARNE AND CO.,

BEDFORD STREET, STRAND.

the old bridge, passed on to lose uself gradu- as dry as hay—coming no one knew how, and ally in the gloom of the deep masses of forest- going no one knew where.

MARY OF BURGUNDY;

of a mile of the common at the period. In his person; there was nothing either to strike long tight hose common at the period. In his (30 o lettee Veti was impossible to stand belt, was a dagger and knile; but on his head before him, and not to leel one s self, without he had no covaring, craftly a presence of an his dear to be with the covaring to the first covaring to the inest could produce yet mend the cooke, as if knowing that his words marks of roll, and even of strik, were apparent were to be obeyed. But that was not all; from marks of roll, and even of strik, were apparent were to be obeyed. But that was not all; from marks of roll, and even of strik, were apparent were to be obeyed. But that was not all; from

A SLEEPING BOY AND A FALSE PRINCE,

IT was on the evening of a beautiful day in the beginning of September, 1456—one of those fair autumn days that wean us, as it were, from the passing summer, with the light as bright, and the sky as full of rays, as in the richest hours of June; and with nothing but a scarce perceptible shade of yellow in the woods to tell that it is not the proudest time of the year's prime. It was in the evening, I have said; but nothing yet betokened dark-ness. The sun had glided a considerable way on his descent down the bright arch of the western sky, yet without one ray being sha-dowed, without one beam being lost. He had reached that degree of declination alone, at which his light, pouring from a spot a little above the horizon, produced, as it streamed over forest and hill, grand masses of light and shade, with every here and there a point of dazzling brightness, where the clear evening rays were reflected from stream or lake.

It was in the heart of a deep forest, too, whose immemorial trees, worn away by time, or felled by the axe, left in various places wide open spaces of broken ground and turf, brushwood and dingle-and amidst whose deep recesses a thousand spots of picturesque beauty lay hidden from the eye of man. Those were not, indeed, times when taste and cultivation had taught the human race to appreciate fully all the charms and magnificence wherewith Nature's hand has robed the globe which we inhabit; and the only beings that then trod the deeper glades of the forest were the woodman, the hunter, or those less fortunate persons who, as we see them represented by the wild pencil of Salvator Rosa, might greatly increase the picturesque beauty of the scenes they frequented; but, probably, did not particularly feel it themselves. But there is, nevertheless, in the heart of man, a native sense of beauty, a latent sympathy, a harmony with

CHAPTER I. all that is lovely on the earth, which makes him unconsciously seek out spots of peculiar sweetness, not only for his daily dwelling, but also for both his temporary resting place, and for the mansion of his long repose, whether the age or the country be rude or not.

Look at the common cemetery of a village, and you will generally find that it is pitched in the most picturesque spot to be found in the neighbourhood: if left to his free will, the peasant will almost always-without well knowing why—build his cottage where he may have something fair or bright before his eyes; and the very herd, while watching his cattle or his sheep, climbs up the face of the crag, to sit and gaze over the fair expanse of Nature's face.

It was in the heart of a deep forest, then, at the distance of nearly twenty miles from Louvain, that a boy, of about ten years of age, was seen sleeping by the side of a small stream; which, dashing over a high rock hard by, gathered its bright waters in a deep basin at the foot, and then rushed, clear and rapidly, through the green turf beyond. The old trees of the wood were scattered abroad from the stream, as if to let the little waterfall sparkle at its will in the sunshine. One young ash tree, alone, self-sown by the side of the river, waved over the boy's head, and cast a dancing veil of checkered light and shade upon features as fair as eye ever looked upon.

At about a hundred yards from the spot where he was lying, a sandy road wound through the savannah, and plunged into the deeper parts of the wood. On the other side, however, the ground being of a more open nature, it might be seen winding up the steep ascent of a high hill, with the banks, which occasionally flanked it to the east, surmounted by long lines of tall overhanging trees.

A little bridge of stone, whose ruinous condition spoke plainly how rarely the traveller's foot trod the path through the forest, spanned over the stream at a little distance. And the evening light, as it poured in from the west, ally in the gloom of the deep masses of forest-ground beyond.

The dress of the sleeper accorded well with the scene in which he was found; it consisted of a full coat, of forest-green, gathered round his waist by a broad belt, together with the long tight hose common at the period. In his belt, was a dagger and knife; but on his head he had no covering, except the glossy curls of his dark brown hair. And though the material of his garments was of the finest cloth in the dusty and torn state of his habiliments.

His breath was so light, and his slumber was cheeks. No sound had any effect upon his ear, though, while he lay beside the stream, a wild, timid stag came rustling through the brushcurls of his hair for nearly half an hour, withmoving objects made their appearance at the most distant point of the road, where it sunk over the hill. At first, all that could be seen was a body moving forward down the descent, enveloped in a cloud of dust; but, gradually, it separated into distinct parts, and assumed the form of a party of armed horsemen. Their number might be ten or twelve; and, by the slowness of their motions, it seemed that they had already travelled far. More than once, as they descended, they paused, and appeared to plating its beauty, or doubtful of the road they ought to take. These pauses, however, always ended in their resuming their way towards the spot which we have described. When they at length reached it, they again drew the rein; and it became evident, that uncertainty, with regard to their farther progress, had been the cause of their several halts upon the hill.

'By my faith, Sir Thibalt of Neufchatel,' said one of the horsemen who rode a little in advance of the others, 'for Marshal of Burgundy, you know but little of your lord's By the holy Virgin, methinks dominions. that you are much better acquainted with every of ground between Brussels and Tirlemont;

caught bright upon the countenance of the fain have squeezed the double crowns out of sleeping boy, upon the dancing cascade above their purses. It was then their invariable his head, upon many a flashing turn in the reply, that the Marshal of Burgundy had been stream, and, after gilding the ivy that mantled upon them with his lances, and drained them the old bridge, passed on to lose itself gradu- as dry as hay-coming no one knew how, and going no one knew where.'

The man who spoke was yet not only in his prime, but in the early part of that period of life which is called middle age. There was no peculiar beauty in his countenance, nor in his person; there was nothing either to strike or to please. Yet it was impossible to stand before him, and not to feel one's self, without very well knowing why, in the presence of an extraordinary man. There was in his deportment to be traced the evident habit of comwhich the looms of Ypres could produce, yet mand. He spoke, as if knowing that his words marks of toil, and even of strife, were apparent were to be obeyed. But that was not all; from underneath the overhanging penthouse of his He lay, however, in that calm, deep, placid thick eyebrows shone forth two keen grey sleep, only known to youth, toil, and innocence. eyes, which had in them a prying, inquisitive cunning, which seemed anxiously exerted to so calm, that he might have seemed dead, but discover at once the thoughts of those they for the rosy hue of health that overspread his gazed upon, before a veil could be drawn over motives or feelings, to conceal them from that searching glance.

Those given to physiognomy might have gathered from his high and projecting, but wood to drink of its waters, and suddenly gathered from his high and projecting, but seeing a human thing amidst the solitude of narrow forehead, the indications of a keen and the forest, bounded quick away among the observing mind with but little imagination, long glades of the wood. After that, the leaves superstition without fancy, and talent without waved over him, and the wind played with the wit. The thin, compressed lips, the naturally firm-set posture of the teeth, the curling line out any living creature approaching to disturb from the nostril to the corner of the mouth, his repose. At the end of that time, some might have been construed to imply a heart naturally cruel, which derived not less pleasure from the wounds inflicted by bitter words than from producing mere corporeal pain. His dress, at this time of life, was splendid to excess; and the horse on which he rode showed the high blood that poured through his veins, by a degree of fire and energy far superior to that exhibited by the chargers of his companions, though the journey he had performed was the same which had so wearied them.

As he spoke the words before detailed, he gaze over the country, as if either contem- looked back to a gentleman, who rode a step or two behind him on his right hand, and on his countenance appeared, what he intended to be, a smile of frank, good-humoured rail-The natural expression of his features mingled with it nevertheless, and gave it an air of sarcasm, which made the bitter, perhaps, preponderate over the sweet.

The person to whom he addressed himself, however, listened with respectful good humour.

'In truth, my lord,' he replied, 'so little have I dwelt in this part of the duke's dominions, that I know my way less than many a foot-boy. I once was acquainted with every rood high road and by-path of my poor appanage but, God be thanked, my memory is short, of Dauphiny. At least so the worthy burghers and I have forgotten it all, as readily as I of Vienne were wont to assert, when we would hope you, sir, may forget certain marches in

They are forgot, Lord Marshal, they are forgot,' replied the Dauphin, afterwards famous as Louis XI., 'and can never more be remembered but to show me how much more pleasant it is to have the Lord of Neufchatel for a friend rather than an enemy. But, in heaven's name,' he added, changing the subject quickly, 'before we go farther, let us seek some one to show us the way, or let us halt our horses here, and wait for the fat citizens of Ghent that we left on the other side of the

trow, to find any guide here, without Saint must lie in the forest all night if ye refuse Hubert, or some other of the good saints, me.' were to send us a white stag with a collar of gold round his neck, to lead us safely home, as the old legends tell us they used to do of

'The saints have heard your prayer, my lord,' cried one of the party who had strayed a little to the left, but not so far as to be out of hearing the conversation which was passing between the other two; 'the saints have heard your prayer, and here is the white stag, in the form of a fair boy in a green jerkin.' As he spoke, he pointed forward with his hand towards the little cascade, where the boy, who had been sleeping by its side, had now started up, awakened by the sound of voices, and of horses' feet, and was gazing on the travellers, with anxious eyes, and his hand resting on his dagger.

'Why, how now, boy!' cried the Dauphin, spurring up towards the stream. Thinkest thou that, we are Jews, or cutclutchest thy knife so fearfully? Say, canst thou tell how far we are from Tirlemont?'

The boy eyed the party for several mowhether you are cut-throats or not?' he said, at length: 'I have seen cut-throats in as fine clothes. How far is it from Tirlemont? As far as it is from Liege or Namur.'

'Then, by my troth, Sir Marshal,' said horses will never carry us thither this night.

What is to be done?'

'What is the nearest town or village, boy?' demanded the Marshal of Burgundy. we be at equal distances from Namur and Liege and Tirlemont, we cannot be far from Hannut.

'Hannut is the nearest place,' answered the boy; 'but it is two hours' ride for a fully how little interest they took in his feelings tired horse.'

'We will try it, however,' said the Marshal; and then added, turning to the Dau- ing himself on the bank of the stream, gazed Dauphiny, made when Louis the Dauphin was though first cousin of the bad Duke of an enemy to Burgundy, instead of an honoured Gueldres, is a noble gentleman as ever lived; and I can promise you a fair reception. Though once a famous soldier, he has long cast by the lance and casque; and, buried deep in studies, which churchmen say are hardly over holy, he passes his whole time in solitude, except when some ancient friend breaks in upon his reveries. Such a liberty I may well take. - Now, boy, tell us our road, and there is a silver piece for thy pains.

The boy stooped not to raise the money which the Marshal threw him, but replied eagerly, ' If any one will take me on the croup behind him, I will show you easily the way: His companion shook his head with a doubt- -nay, I beseech ye, noble lords, take me ful smile, as he replied, 'It will be difficult, I with you; for I am wearied and alone, and I

'But dost thou know the way well, my fair boy?' demanded the Dauphin, approaching nearer, and stooping over his saddle-bow to speak to the boy with an air of increasing kindness. 'Thou art so young, methinks thou scarce canst know all the turnings of a wood like this. Come, let us hear if thy knowledge is equal to the task of guiding us?

'That it is,' answered the boy at once. 'The road is as easy to find as a heron's nest in a bare tree. One has nothing to do but to follow on that road over the bridge: take 'the two first turnings to the right, and then the next to the left, and at the end of a league more the castle is before you.'

'Ay,' said the Dauphin, 'is it so easy as that? Then, by my faith, I think we can find it ourselves.—Come, Sir Marshal, come! and, so saying, he struck his spurs into his horse's sides, and cantered over the bridge.

The Marshal of Burgundy looked back throats, or wild men of the woods, that thou with a lingering glance of compassion at the poor boy thus unfeelingly treated by his companion. But, as the Prince dashed forward and waved his hand for him to follow, ments ere he replied. 'How should I know he rode on also, though not without a muttered comment on the conduct of the other, which might not have given great pleasure had it been vented aloud. The whole train followed; and, left alone, the boy stood silent, gazing on them as they departed, with a the Dauphin, turning to his companion, 'our flushed cheek and a curling lip. 'Out upon the traitors !' he exclaimed at length. men are knaves; yet it is but little honour to their knavery to cheat a boy like me.'

The train wound onward into the wood, and the last horseman was soon hid from his eyes: but the merry sound of laughing voices, borne by the wind to his ears for some moments after they were out of sight, spoke pain-or situation.

He listened till all was still; and then, seatphin. 'The Lord of the castle of Hannut, sir, vacantly on the bubbling waters as they rushed hurriedly by him : while the current of his own 'I know it all, Master Hugh,' interrupted scene and sorrow, such as infancy has seldom swallow; so I know it all, and a good deal sobbed as if his heart would have broken.

and a chest like that of a mountain bull. He take lodging in the town prison of Liege. might be nearly forty years of age; and his face, which had once been fair—a fact which boy; 'did they free you for good will?' was vouched alone by his light brown hair, 'Not they,' replied Matthew Gournay:

said, firmly and familiarly on the boy's sword, or a sword for my hand. shoulder; and the expression of the young wanderer's countenance, as he started up, and beheld who it was that stood near him at once showed not only that they were old ac-unexpected and joyful.

'Matthew Gournay!' exclaimed the boy, 'good Matthew Gournay, is it you, indeed? Oh, why did you not come before? With your fifty good lances we might yet have enough, lances and all, as I live. We must held the castle out, till we were joined by the to cover, Hugh, we must to cover! Quicktroops from Utrecht; but now all is lostthe castle taken, and my father --- thoughts held as rapid and disturbed a course. the soldier- I know it all better than the As memory after memory of many a painful pater-noster. Bad news flies faster than a known, came up before his sight, his eyes more than you yourself know. You ask, why I filled, the tears rolled rapidly over his cheeks, did not come too; by our Lady, for the and casting himself prostrate on the ground, simplest reason in the world-because I could he hid his face amongst the long grass, and not. I was lying like an old rat in a trap, with four stone walls all round about me, in He had not lain there long, however, when the good city of Liege. Duke Philip heard a heavy hand, laid firmly on his shoulder, of the haste I was making to give you help, caused him once more to start up. And and cogged with the old bishop-may his though the figure which stood by him when he skull be broken! - to send out a couple of did so was not one whose aspect was very pre- hundred refters to intercept us on our possessing, yet it would be difficult to describe march .- What would you have? We fought the sudden lightning of joy that sparkled in like devils, but we were taken at a disadhis eyes through the tears with which they vantage, by a superior force. All my gallant still overflowed. The person who had roused fellows were killed or dispersed; and at last, him from the prostrate despair in which he finding my back against a rock, with six had cast himself down, was a middle-sized, spears at my breast, and not loving the look broad-made man, with long sinewy arms, of such a kind of toasting fork, I agreed to

'But how got you out, then?' demanded the

and clear blue eye-had now reached a hue they gave me cold water and hard bread, nearly approaching to the colour of maho- and vowed every day to stick my head upon gany, by constant exposure to the summer's the gate of the town, as a terror to all marausun and the winter's cold. There was in it, ders, as they called me. But the fools showed withal, an expression of daring hardihood, themselves rank burghers, by leaving me my softened and, as it were, purified by a frank, arms; and I soon found means to get the iron free, good-humoured smile, which was not bars out of the windows, ventured a leap of without a touch of droll humour. His garb thirty feet, swam the ditch, climbed the wall, at once bespoke him one of those vagrant and here I am in the forest of Hannot-but sons of Mars, with whom war in some shape not alone, Master Hugh; I have got a part was a never failing trade; -a class of which of my old comrades together already, and we must speak more hereafter, and which hope soon to have a better band than ever. the abuses of the feudal system, the constant The old seneschal, too, from the castle, is feuds of chieftain with chieftain, and the long with us, and from him we heard all the bad and desolating warfare between France and news. But, though he talked of murder and England had at that time rendered but too putting to death, and flaying alive, and vowed common in every part of Europe. He was that every body in the castle had been killed not, indeed, clothed from head to heel in but himself, I got an inkling from the old cold iron, as was customary with the knight charcoal burner's wife, at the hut in the wood, or man-at-arms when ready for the field; but of how you had escaped, and whither you had there was quite a sufficient portion of old gone. So, thinking as you were on foot and steel about his person, in the form of arms alone, that you might want help and a horse, both offensive and defensive, to show that I tracked you like a deer to this place: for hard blows were the principal merchandise in your father was always a good friend to me in which he traded. The fime of need, and I will stand by you, He laid his large hairy hand, as I have Master Hugh, while I have a hand for my

'Hark!' cried the boy, almost as the other spoke; 'there's a bugle on the hill; it must be the duke's butchers following me.'

'A bugle!' cried the soldier; 'a cow's horn quaintances, but that their meeting was both blown by a sow-driver, you mean. None of the duke's bugles ever blew a blast like that, something between the groaning of a blacksmith's bellows and the grunting of a hog. 'But there they are,' he continued, 'sure thy hand, boy-they are coming down straggling like fallow deer !'

So saying, Matthew Gournay sprang up the form the difficult manceuvre of throwing salt high bank, in falling over which the little upon its tail, he regained a grasp of the stream formed the cascade we have noticed; bridle-rein which the horse had twitched out and, as he climbed the rock himself, he as- of his hand; and then went on with his story, sisted, or rather dragged up after him, his -interrupting it, however, every now and young companion, whose hand he held locked in his own, with a grasp which no slight horse, somewhat in the following style: weight could have unbent. For a moment, they paused on the top of the crag, to take las?-I was saying-so ho! beast, I say; the another look at the approaching party, and then plunged amongst the long shrubs and river. I was saying that, after the castle was

CHAPTER II.

THE FREEBOOTERS OF THE FOREST.

THE party, whose approach had interrupted the conversation of Matthew Gournay with his young companion, were not long before they reached the little open spot in the forest, from which they had scared the other two; and, as it was at that point that their road first fell in with the stream, they paused for a moment to water their horses ere they proceeded. Their appearance and demeanour corresponded well with the peculiar sound of the horn which they had blown upon the hill; for though the instrument which announced their approach was martial in itself, yet the sounds which they produced from it were any thing but military; and though swords and lances, casques and breast-plates, were to be seen in profusion amongst them, there was scarcely one of the party who had not a certain burgher rotundity of figure, or negligence of gait, far more in harmony with furred gowns and caps à la mortier than with war steeds and glittering arms.

The first, who paused beside the stream, had nearly been thrown over his horse's head, by the animal suddenly bending his neck to drink; and it was long before the rider could sufficiently compose himself again in the saddle to proceed with some tale which he had been telling to one of his companions, who urged him to make an end of his story, with an eagerness which seemed to show that the matter was one of great interest to him at

'Well-a-day, Master Nicholas, well-aday!' cried the discomposed horseman, 'let Fruse, the burgher of Ghent, to whom this me but settle myself on my stool—saddle, I mean: God forgive me! but this cursed beast has pulled the bridle out of my hands. -So ho! Bernard, so ho!-there, there, surely thou couldst drink without bending thy head so low.

While he thus spoke, by a slow and cautious movement, not unlike that with which a child approaches a sparrow, to per- stated, then, to address sundry admonitions to his

'Well, where was I, worthy Master Nichodevil's in thee, thou wilt have me into the ther plunged another the long strikes and the real strikes. I was saying that the winding glen, down which the stream the poor boy, Hugh,—for which last, I hear, wandered previous to its fall.

Bernard, hold up thy head!—Count Adolphus himself fled away by a postern door, and is now a prisoner in-

Nay, but, Master Martin, you said they were all put to death, interrupted one of his companions.

Remember what the doctors say,' replied the other; anamely, that there is no general rule without its exception. They were all killed but those that ran away, which were only Count Adolphus and his horse, who got away together the one upon the other. Fool that he was to trust himself upon a horse's back! It was his ruin, alack! it was his

'How so?' demanded Master Nicholas; 'did the horse throw him and break his pate? Methought you said, but now, that he was alive and a prisoner.

'And I said truly, too, answered the other. 'Nevertheless, his mounting that horse was the cause of his ruin; for though he got off quietly enough, yet, at the bridge below Namur, where, if he had had no horse, he would have passed free, he was obliged to stop to pay pontage* for his beast. A priest, who was talking with the toll-man, knew him; and he was taken on the spot, and cast into prison.

'Methinks it was more the priest's fault than the horse's then,' replied Master Nicho-las; 'but whoever it was that betrayed him, bad was the turn that they did to the city of Ghent; for, what with his aid, and that of the good folks of Gueldres, and the worthy folks of Utrecht, we might have held the proud Duke at bay, and wrung our rights from him drop by drop, like water from a sponge.'

God knows, God knows!' replied Martin was addressed; 'God knows! it is a fine

* Philip de Comines, who relates this anecdote much in the same terms as those used by good Martin Fruse in the text, places it, however several years later; though from the time that Adolphus Duke of Gueldres, here called Count Adolphus, was kept in prison by the Duke of Burgundy, it would seem that the time of his capture was here correctly thing to have one's rights, surely; but, some- fire, he managed with perfect ease. There he or I drop down dead. Here, horse-boy, come and pluck his nose out of the pool; for town-house.

The worthy burgher was soon relieved from his embarrassments; and his horse being once more put upon the road, he led the way onward, followed by the rest of the party, with their servants and attendants. The place of leader was evidently conceded to good Martin Fruse; but this distinction was probably assigned to him, more on account of his wealth and integrity, than from the possession of any fine wit, great sense, energetic activity, or other requisite for a popular leader. He was in truth, a worthy, honest man, somewhat easily persuaded; especially where his general vanity, and, more particularly, his own opinion of his powers as a politician, were brought into play: but his mind was neither vigorous nor acute; though some-

and eloquence to his words.

Amongst those who followed him, however, were two or three spirits of a higher order; who, without his purity of motives, or kindly disposition, possessed far greater talents, activity, and vigour. Nevertheless, turbulent by disposition and by habit, few of the burghers of Ghent, at that time, possessed any very grand and general views, either for asserting the liberties and rights of their beasts in vain. country, or for pursuing any plan of personal ambition. They contented themselves with occasional tumults, or with temporary allithe clouds above their heads, showed that the ances with any of the states and cities of the sun was sinking beneath the horizon's edge: low countries; few of which rested long with-

of injustice, would lend energy to his actions,

mentioned; for, though at that time acting no traverse, night fell completely over the earth. prominent part, he exerted considerable influprominent part, he exerted considerable influerable in fluerable in after days, on the fortunes of his in any degree to prevent them from finding young Spanish jennet; which, though full of more timid, into the form of an armed man, how, I thought we were very comfortable and was something, indeed, in the manner in happy in the good old city, before there was which he excited the horse into fury, gave it any quarrel about rights at all. Well I know, the rein, and let it dash wild past all his comwe have never been happy since; and I have panions, as if it had become perfectly un-been forced to ride on horseback by the week governable; and then, without difficulty, together; for which sin, my flesh and skin do reined it up with a smile of triumph,-which daily penance, as the chirurgeons of Namur gave no bad picture of a mind conscious of could vouch if they would. Nevertheless, one powers of command, ambitious of their exermust be patriotic, and all that, so I would not cise, and fearless of the result. How this grumble,—if this beast would but give over character of mind became afterwards modidrinking, which I think he will not do before fied by circumstances, will be shown more fully in the following pages.

In the meanwhile we must proceed with the I cannot move him more than I could the train of burghers as they rode on through the wood; concerting various plans amongst themselves for concealing from the Duke of Burgundy the extent of their intrigues with Adolphus of Gueldres, and with the revolted citizens of Utrecht, for excusing themselves on those points which had reached his knowledge, and for assuaging his anger by presents and submission. The first thing to be done. before presenting themselves at his court, was, of course, to strip themselves of the warlike habiliments in which they had flaunted, while entertaining hopes of a successful revolt. For this purpose, they proposed to avoid the high road either to Brussels or Louvain; and as most of them were well acquainted with the country through which they had to pass, they turned to the left, after having proceeded about a mile farther on their way, and put times an innate sense of rectitude, and hatred spurs to their horses in order to get out of the forest before nightfall, which was now fast approaching.

The way was difficult, however, and full of large ruts and stones; in some places overgrown with briars, in some places interrupted by deep ravines. Here, it would go down so deep a descent, that slowness of progression was absolutely necessary to the safety of their necks; there, it would climb so steep a hill, that whip and spur were applied to their

As they thus journeyed on, making but little way, the bright rosy hue which tinged the red, after growing deeper and deeper for out being in open rebellion against their some time, began to tade away into the grey; governors. One of the party, however, which accommore faint, and at length, while they had yet panied good Martin Fruse must not pass unat least three miles of forest ground to country. He was, at the period I am speak-ing of, a bold, brave, high-spirited boy; by the objects round about them; although it no means unlike the one we have seen sleep-lent a mysterious sort of grandeur to the deep ing by the cascade, though, perhaps, two or masses and long dim glades of the forest, three years older. He was strong and well-made the rocks look like towers and castles, proportioned for his age, and rode a wild and converted many a tree, to the eyes of the

After having gone on in this state for about half an hour,-just a sufficient time, indeed, cried the rough voice which had commanded to work up every sort of apprehension to the them to halt, 'and we shall soon see what utmost, yet not long enough to familiarise the travellers with the darkness,-just when degree of light yet remained in the heavens now taking advantage of a vacancy he saw in high banks of which were lined all the way strong arm before he could force his way along with tall and overhanging beeches. through; and his light jennet, thrown sud-The sort of dingle, however, which they now denly upon its haunches, slipped on the green shrubs; and no means of egress whatever ap- the ground. peared, except by climbing some of the steep ascents which surrounded it on every side. There was a small piece of level ground at the bottom, of about a hundred yards in diameter, and the moment they had reached the flat, the word 'Halt!' pronounced in a loud and imperative voice, caused every one suddenly to draw his bridle-rein with somewhat timid obedience, though no one distinguished who was the speaker.

The matter was not left long in doubt. dark figure glided from the brushwood across however, was performed without harshness; their path, half a dozen more followed; and the glistening of the faint light upon various pieces of polished iron showed that there was no lack of arms to compel obedience to the peremptory order they had received to halt.

As the persons who obstructed the way, however, seemed but few in number, one of the more bellicose of the burghers called was to come next,-not at all unlike a flock of upon his companions to resist. His magnanimity was suddenly diminished by a long arm stretched from the bushes beside him which applied the stroke of a quarter-staff with full force to his shoulders; and though a in a bantering tone: - Now, my masters, cuirass, by which his person was defended, protected him from any serious injury, yet he was thrown forward upon his horse's neck with a sound very much resembling that produced by the falling of an empty kettle from the hands of a slovenly cook. All were now of one opinion, that it was useless to contend with such invisible enemies also, especially as those that were visible were gradually increasing in numbers; and worthy Martin Fruse led the way to a valorous surrender, by begging the gentlemen of the forest 'to spare them for God's sake, stuff you are made of.

'Down from your horses, every one of you,'

The citizens hastened to obey; and, in the every one was calling to mind all the thou- terror which now reigned completely amongst sand stories, which were, in those days, alas! them, strange were the attitudes which they too true ones, of robbers, and murderers, and assumed, and strange was the tumbling off, free plunderers,—the whole party plunged on either side of their beasts, as they hurried down into a deep dell, the aspect of which to show prompt submission to the imperious was not at all calculated to assuage their command they had received. In the confu-terrors, whether reasonable or foolish. Not, sion and disarray thus produced, only one indeed, that it was more gloomy than the person of all their party seemed to retain full road through which they had been lately travelling; rather, on the contrary, whatever than the boy we have before described, who. found its way more readily into that valley- the ranks of their opponents, dashed forward where the trees were less high, and at greater for a gap in the wood, and had nearly effected intervals from each other-than into the nar- his escape. He was too late, however, by a row road which had led them thither; the single moment: his bridle was caught by a entered, was clothed with low but thick turf, and rolled with her young master on

'By my faith,' said the man who had thus circumvented him, 'thou art a bold young springal, but thou must back with me, my boy;' and so saying, he raised him, not unkindly from the earth, and led him to the place where his companions stood.

The burghers and their attendants-in all, about ten in number-were now divested of their arms, offensive and defensive, by the nameless kind of gentry into whose hands they had fallen. This unpleasant ceremony, and though no resistance of any kind was offered, their captors abstained, with very miraculous forbearance, from examining the contents of their pouches, and from searching for any other metal than cold iron. all this was completed, and the good citizens of Ghent, reduced to their hose and jerkins, stood passive, in silent expectation of what sheep that a shepherd's dog has driven up into a corner of a field, - the same hoarsevoiced gentleman, who had hitherto acted as the leader of their assailants, addressed them tell me truly,' he cried, 'whether do ye covet to go with your hands and feet at liberty, or to have your wrists tied with cords till the blood starts out from underneath your nails, and your ankles garnished in the same fashion?'

The answer of the citizens may well be conceived; and the other went on in the same jeering manner:- 'Well, then, swear to me by all you hold holy and dear-but stay! -First tell me who and what ye are, that I may frame the oath; for each man in the world holds holy and dear that

'We are poor unhappy burghers of Ghent,' replied Martin Fruse, who, though at first he had been terrified to a very undignified degree, now began to recover a certain portion of composure, — we are poor unhappy burghers of Ghent, who have been seduced by vain hopes of some small profit to ourselves and our good city, to get upon horseback. Alack! and a well-a-day! that ever honest, sober-minded men should be persuaded to trust their legs across such galloping, uncertain, treacherous beasts.

tain, treacherous beasts.

'Ha! ha! ha!' shouted the man who had addressed him; 'as I live by sword and dagger, it is good Martin Fruse coming from Namur. Well, Martin, the oath I shall put to thee is this,—that by all thy hopes of golden florins, by all thy reverence for silks and furs, and cloths of extra fineness, by thy gratitude to the shuttle and the loom, and by thy respect and love for a fine fleece of English wool, thou wilt not attempt to escape from my hands, till I fix thy ransom and give thee leave to go.

Martin Fruse very readily took the oath prescribed, grateful in his heart for any mitigation of his fears, though trembling somewhat at the name of ransom, which augured ill for the glittering heaps which he had left at home. His comrades all followed his example, on an oath of the same kind being exacted from each; but when it was addressed to the youth who accompanied them, a different scene was acted. He replied boldly, 'Of cloths and furs I know nothing, but that they cover me, and I will not take such a warehouse vow for the best man that ever drew a sword.

'How now, how now, Sir Princox!' cried Martin Früse; 'art thou not my nephew, Albert Maurice? Take the oath this gentle-man offers thee, sirrah, and be well content that he does not strike off thy young foolish

'I will swear by my honour, uncle, replied the boy, but I will never swear by cloth and florins, for such a vow would bind me but little.

'Well, well, thy honour will do,' said the leader of their captors; 'though, by my faith, I think we must keep thee with us, and make a soldier of thee, for doubtless thou are unworthy of the high honour of becomises a busches."

coming a burgher of Ghent.

.. The sneering tone in which this was spoken expressed not ill the general feeling of contempt with which the soldiers of that day of life. siderable, proceeded solely from sensations came evident to Martin Fruse that a party of approaching compassion. They looked upon citizens of Ghent was a rich prize in the eyes which his neighbour holds foolish and the burgher, indeed, as a sort of inferior animal, whose helplessness gave it some claim upon their generosity; and such was probably the feeling that prompted the mild and indulgent manner in which the body of roving adventurers who had captured the Gandois travellers, marshalled their prisoners in rank, and led them away from the high road - where, though improbable, such a thing as an interruption might accidentally take place to the deeper parts of the forest, where silence and solitude seemed to reign supreme.

This part of the arrangement, however, was not at all to the taste of good Martin Fruse; and though he certainly did not venture any opposition, yet, while led along, together with his companions, by fifteen or sixteen armed and lawless men, it was with fear and trembling that he rolled his eyes around upon the dark and dreary masses of wood, the long profound glades, in which nothing was to be distinguished, and on the wild and broken rocks, which every now and then burst through their covering of trees and shrubs, and towering up into the sky, caught upon their brows the first rays of the rising moon, invisible to those who wandered through the forest at their foot.

The scene was altogether a great deal too sublime and picturesque for his taste; and he could not help thinking, as he walked unwilllingly along, how admirably fitted was the place into which he was led for committing murder, without fear of discovery, Then would he picture to his own mind his body left exposed beneath the green wood trees, to be preyed on by the ravens, and beaten by the wintry showers, and his heart would melt with tender compassion for himself, when he thought how all his good gossips of Ghent would, in years to come, tell the lamentable story of worthy Martin Fruse, and how he was murdered in the forest of Hannut, to the wondering ears of a chance guest, over a seacoal fire, in the midst of the cold winter.

He had nearly wept at the pitiful images he had called up of his own fate, in his own mind; but, before he reached that point, a distant neighing met his ear. The horses on which he and his companions had ridden, and which were led after them by their captors, caught the sound also, and answered in the same sort; and in a few minutes after, a bright light began to gleam through the wood, which proved, on their farther advance, to proceed from a watch-fire, by the side of who had captured them was lying asleep. looked upon any of the milder occupations He started up, however, on their approach; Whatever kindness they showed to- and by the congratulations which passed muwards the citizen, -which was at times con-tually between him and his comrades, it be-of the freemen of the forest. It is true that articles of furniture, the room was adorned he would rather have had his worth appreciated in a different manner; but the sight of the fire cheered his heart, and a sumpter horse, which the good burghers had brought with them, being led forward and relieved of its burden, the various stores of provision with which it was loaded were spread out upon the grass, and called up more genial ideas in the mind of the citizen than those which had accompanied him on his way through the forest. The pleasures of this new subject of contemplation, indeed, were for a few minutes disturbed by the apprehension that the captors would proceed to divide the spoil of the panniers without assigning any part to the original proprietors. But this source of uneasiness was soon removed; and, on being made to sit down by the fire, and invited frankly and freely to partake of all the good things once his own, the heart of Martin Fruse expanded with joy; the character of robber acquired a dignity and elevation in his eyes which it had never before possessed; and deriving from cold fat capon and excellent wine both present satisfaction and anticipations of future good treatment, he gave himself up to joy, and began to gaze round upon the faces of his new comrades with every inclination to be pleased.

CHAPTER III.

THE LORD OF HANNUT'S GUESTS.

LEAVING the worthy burgher and his com- most white. His complexion was of a pale, panions in the forest, we must change the clear brown, without a tinge of red in any scene for a while, and bring the reader into part except his lips; and, as he gazed out the interior of one of the feudal mansions of upon the sky, there was a still calm spread the period. The room into which we intend to introduce him was small in size; and, being placed in a high, square tower, attached to the castle of Hannut, it took the exact had not the light of his large dark eye told of form of the building, except inasmuch as a bright and living soul within. We must portion was taken off the western side for the take leave to look for a moment into his purpose of admitting a staircase, on which, bosom as he stood in his lonely study, gazing indeed, no great space was thrown away, forth upon the sky. The furniture of the room was small in quansand quaint devices, together with two or future fate? Is you the book on which the three settles, or stools without any backs at Almighty hand has written in characters of all, a silver lamp, hanging by a thick brass light the foreseen history of the world he has chain from the centre of a roof formed into created? It may be so nay, probably it is; the shape of a tent by the meeting of a num- and yet how little do we know of this earth ber of grooved arches, and a small black that we inhabit, and of you deep blue vault cabinet, or closet, one of the doors of which that circles us around. The peasant, when stood open, displaying within, in splendid he hears of my lonely studies; endues my bindings of crimson velvet, what might in mind, in his rude fancy, with power over the that day have been considered a most precious invisible world, and all the troops of spirits library, comprising about forty tomes of ma- that possibly throng the very air we breathe; nuscript. Besides being decorated by these and kings and princes themselves send to seek by fine hangings of old tapestry: but the principal object in the whole chamber was a table and reading-desk, of some dark coloured wood, on which was displayed, wide open, the broad vellum leaves of a richly illuminated manuscript. The table and its burden were placed exactly beneath the silver lamp already mentioned, which threw a strong but flickering light upon the pages of the book; and a chair which stood near seemed to show that somebody had recently been reading.

The person who had been so employed, however, had by this time ceased; and having risen from his seat, was standing beside an open casement, pierced through the thick walls at such a height from the floor as just to enable him to lean his arm upon the sill of the window and gaze out upon the scene

beyond.;

Through this open casement, at the time I speak of, the bright stars of a clear autumn night were twinkling like diamonds in the unclouded sky, and the sweet, warm, westerly wind, breathing of peace and harvest from the plains beyond, sighed over the tops of the tall forest trees, and poured into the window just raised above them. The person who gazed over the wide expanse commanded by the tower was a tall, strong man, of perhaps a little more than forty years of age, with a forehead somewhat bald, and hair which had once been black, but which was now mingled thickly with grey; while his beard, which was short and neatly trimmed, had become alover every feature, which, together with the bloodless hue of his skin, would have made his countenance look like that of the dead,

And are those clear orbs,' he thought, as tity, and consisted of a few large chairs of with his glance fixed upon the heavens he saw dark black oak, whose upright backs of al- star after star shine forth, - and are those most gigantic height were carved in a thou- bright orbs really the mystic prophets of our knowledge and advice from my lips, while I terious subjects, which the height of human 'it is all a dream!

powers with which the vulgar mind invests me garded him, but, mingled imperceptibly with are not all in vain : they give me at least cor- the current of other feelings, gratified vanity poreal peace-repose from all the turbulent had its share also. Nor, indeed, though he follies-the wild whirling nothings, which affected to despise the world and the world's man calls pleasure, or business, or policy-power, did the influence that he exercised more empty, more unimportant, in relation to upon that world displease him. the grand universe, than the dancing of the too, that influence might be the more gratifymyriad motes in the sunshine of a summer's ing, because it was of an uncommon kind; day. They give me peace-repose. I am no and though doubtless, true philosophy, and a longer called upon with an ash staff, or bar just estimate of the emptiness of this earth's of sharpened iron, to smite the breast of my pleasures and desires, might have some share fellow-men, in some mad prince's quarrel. I in the distant solitude which he maintained, am no longer called upon to take counsel with the pride of superior knowledge had a portion a crowd of grey-beard fools, in order to steal in the contempt with which he looked upon a few roods of dull, heavy soil from the the generality of beings like himself. Much dominions of some neighbouring king. No, true benevolence of heart and susceptibility of no; the very superstitious dread in which feeling, with a considerable degree of imaginthey hold me gives me peace; ay, and even ative enthusiasm, were, in fact, the principal power—that phantom folly of which they are features of his character; but his reasoning all so fond, and be it far from me to unde- powers also were strong and clear, and very ceive them. like most men, in some degree cheated him- these various qualities of his mind and heart self in regard to his own motives. Doubtless, rather contended against than balanced each the predominating feelings of his heart were other. such as he believed them to be. But, besides those motives on which he suffered his mind susceptibility had ruled almost alone. The to rest, there mingled with the causes of his din of arms, the tumult of conflicting hosts, conduct small portions of those more ordinary the pomp and pageant of the listed field, all desires and passions which minds of a very had charms for him. The strength of his elevated tone are anxious to conceal even frame, together with the skill and dexterity from themselves. Learned beyond any one, given by early education, had made many of perhaps, of his age and country, the Lord of the best knights in Europe go down before Hannut was not a little proud of his know- his lance, and had obtained for him that ledge; but when we remember the darkness degree of glory and applause which might of the times in which he lived, we shall not have kept him for ever one of the rude but wonder that such learning tended but little to gallant champions of the day. But then could answer to peasant and to king, that all knowledge has but discovered to be beyond my powers do not suffice to lay the spirit of its ken. Judicial astrology, in that day, was past happiness from rising before my eyes, held as a science, of the accuracy of which and all my knowledge does not reach to find ignorance alone could be permitted to doubt: that sovereign elixir, consolation for the fate and the belief that a super-human agency was of man. All that I have learned teaches me continually at work in the general affairs of but to know, that I have learned nothing; to this world, was not only a point of faith with feel that science, and philosophy, and wisdom the vulgar, but a point admitted by many of are in vain; and that, hidden mysteriously the most scientific. Magic and necromancy within the bosom of this mortal clay, is some were looked upon as sciences. In vain Friar fine essence, some distinct being, which, while Bacon had written an elaborate treatise to it participates in the pleasures and affections prove their nullity: he himself was cited as of the earthly thing in which it lies concealed, an instance of their existence; and many of thirsts for knowledge beyond the knowledge the most learned were only deterred from fol-of this world, and yearns for joys more pure, lowing them openly, by the fear of those conand loves more unperishable than the loves sequences which rendered their private pursuit and joys of this earth can ever be. Oh, thou more interesting from the danger that accomdear spirit, that in the years long past I have panied it. Although magic, properly so seen look forth upon me from the dear eyes of called, formed no part of his studies, the her long gone; surely, if ever the immortal reputation thereof was not disagreeable to the being came back to visit the earth on which it Lord of Hannut; and it was not alone the once moved, thou wouldst not have left me so destre of obtaining peace and repose, which long to solitude.—No, no,' he added aloud, rendered the awe not unpleasing, wherewith both the peasantry of the neighbourhood, and 'And yet,' he thought, after a pause, 'the his fellow nobles throughout the land resuperior to those of most men in the age in Thus thought the Lord of Hannut, and, which he lived; and, as we sometimes see, enlighten his mind upon those deep and mys- came love,—love of that deep, powerful,

engrossing nature, which a heart such as his what abstractedly, till the horsemen, whom was alone capable of feeling. The cup of he had heard below, had wound along the happiness was given to his lip but for a road, which, following the various sinuosities moment; he was suffered to drink one deep, of the walls and defences of the castle, skirted short draught; and, when he had tasted all the brow of the hill on which it stood, and its sweetness, it was dashed from his hand, was only interrupted by the gate of the bar-never to be filled again. From that moment bacan on the northern side of the building.

his eyes were now cast.

for some time, the edge of the sky began to echoed up the long hollow staircase, which grow lighter, and the clear yellow moon, led to the chamber we have already described. waxing near her full, rose up, and poured a At that sound the Lord of Hannut withdrew of green leaves and waving boughs spread out the book in which he had been lately reading, beneath his eyes. All was still, and solemn, fixed his eyes upon the door. There might be and silent, and full of calm splendour and a slight touch of stage effect in it,-but no tranquil brightness. There was not a motion, matter, -what is there on this earth without there was not a sound, except the slow gliding its quackery? of the beautiful planet up the arch of heaven, and the whispering of the light wind, as it knocked without, and, on being desired to breathed through the boughs of the trees.

could be distinguished, broken occasionally features that seemed originally destined to by the tones of a human voice, speaking a few express any thing but fear. words of order or inquiry. The Lord of Hannut listened, and when the horsemen of Hannut. 'Art thou fool enough, too, to came nearer, he gathered, from an occasional think that I deal with evil spirits? sentence, spoken as they wound round the foot of the tower in which he was standing, that the party were directing their course to kind, good or evil; and, therefore, I always the gates of his own dwelling. His brow like to have the room clear before I intrude, became slightly clouded; and though hospitality was a duty at that time never neglected, his lord, with somewhat of impatience on his yet so rarely was he visited by strangers, and brow. 'Wherefore do you disturb me?' so little did he court society, that he paused somewhat anxiously to think of how he might best receive them. To throw the gates of a below, with a small but gallant train, consistcastle open to all comers, was not indeed at ing of all safe in those days; and though the Lord of Hannut was, at that time, at feud with no his master. 'What of the traveller? Leave one, and though his personal character, the his train to speak for themselves hereafter. strength of his castle, and the number of his retainers, secured him against the free companions and plunderers of the times, it was friend, Thibalt of Neufchatel, craved your not, of course, without pause and examination, hospitality for a single night. that any large body of men were to be ad- 'Thibalt of Neufchatel!' exclaimed the mitted within the gates at such an hour of the other, his face brightening for a moment with his life had passed in solitude, and his days Before it the travellers paused, and the and nights had been occupied by study: nor sound of a horn, winded long and clearly, had he above once for more than twelve years gave notice to the denizens of the castle that passed the limits of that forest, over which admittance was demanded by some one without. Still the master of the mansion remained As he leaned upon the window, and gazed in thought, leaving to the prudence and disout upon the sky, pondering over the strange cretion of his seneschal the task of receiving mystery of man's being, and the lot which and answering the travellers; and the sound fate had cast him, the last faint lingering rays of a falling drawbridge, with the creaking of of twilight were withdrawn from the air, and its beams, and the clanging and clash of its night fell upon one half of the world; but it rusty chains, followed by the clatter of horses' was one of those bright, clear, splendid feet in the court-yard, soon announced that a nights, which often come in the beginning of considerable number of cavaliers had been autumn, as if the heavens loved to look, with admitted within the outer walls. Many voices all their thousand eyes, upon the rich harvest speaking were next heard, and then, after a and the glowing fruit. After he had gazed pause of comparative silence, a slow step tide of golden light over the immense extent from the window, and seating himself before

Scarcely had he done so, when some one come in, presented, at the half-opened door, Suddenly, however, a dull faint noise was the weather-beaten face of an old soldier, heard at some distance; which went on in- who acted the part of seneschal, bearing a creasing slowly, till the sound of horses' feet look of apprehension, which sat ill upon

'Come in, Roger, come in !' cried the Lord

'God forbid, my lord!' replied the man.
'But ill should I like to see a spirit of any

'Well, what would you now? demanded

'So please you, sir, replied the seneschal, 'a noble traveller, just alighted in the court

On with thy tale, good Roger!' interrupted night. He remained, however, musing some- a transitory expression of pleasure, and then turning deadly pale, as the magic of memory, by the spell of that single name, called up the nut, 'Thibalt of Neufchatel!' scenes of the painful past with which that "Even so, Maurice de Hannut ! replied the name was connected. Thibalt of Neuf- Marshal. Good faith, old friend, I scarcely chatel I an old tried friend, indeed I though should have known thee. But more of this is he? Lead the way!'

waiting for the guidance of his seneschal, pro- night, as under my safe conduct, he journeys ceeded, with a rapid step, towards the great hall of the castle, concluding, as was really the case, that into that place of general reception the travellers had been shown on their intimation of the high quality of one of his arrival. It was an immense gloomy apart-guests, and proceeded to welcome the son of ment, paved with stone, occupying the whole the reigning monarch of France, with that interior space at the bottom of the chief grave and stately dignity which the early tower. At one end was the great door, which other was a high pointed window, not unlike that of a cathedral. Arms of every kind then in use decorated the walls in profusion. On duller in writing than they would be in act; the right side of the hall, as you entered from the court, was the wide open hearth, with stools and benches round about; and so entertainment of the Dauphin, the supper wide and cool was the chamber, that at the that was laid before him, and the spiced time I speak of, -though a night in the early lost itself in the gloom at either end of the of the Lord of Hannut. hall, and in the deep hollow of the vault above:

added a degree of light, which, however, was of the body to the Marshal of Burgundy, and confined to the part of the hall in the immediate vicinity of its source; and, within its in- passed many a glance of recognition, and a fluence, disencumbering themselves from some friendly though silent pinch of the arm during the party of travellers just arrived at the safely housed in his chamber, and his commoment that the Lord of Hannut entered. panion, the Lord of Neufchatel, closeted with the massy pillars which supported the vault, tion commenced between two of the followers, rise, but the Marshal of Burgundy imme- some degree, however slight, affect the course diately advanced before the rest to meet his of this true history. friend. When within a few steps of each the other. Each had forgot that many years had passed since they last met, and each had and health; but, when the reality was preto gaze upon the effects of Time's tremendous power, which they mutually presented to each identity of the person before them, and of the that I have not the means to hold. separated. ... usid be ack organ vrotisment "

'Good God !' exclaimed the Lord of Han-sad was the day of our last meeting. Where hereafter,' he added hastily. 'See, here is a noble prince, the Lord Louis of Valois, who Thus saying, the Lord of Hannut, without demands thy care and hospitality for this to visit his noble cousin, our Lord the Duke of Burgundy.

The Lord of Hannut bowed low at this habits of the court and camp had given to his opened at once into the court; and at the demeanour. The forms and ceremonies of that day, which would be found dull enough even to practise at present, would appear still and, therefore, passing over all the etiquette which was observed in the reception and wines that were offered him at his bedside, we part of September, an immense pile of will continue for a moment in the great hall, blazing logs sparkled and hissed in the midst, which, after he retired to rest, remained occucasting a red and flickering light around, pied by the few attendants who had accomwhich, catching on many a lance, and shield, panied him and the Marshal of Burgundy and suit of armour on the opposite wall, thither, and by the usual servants and officers

The presence of their superiors had restrained all free communication between these A cresset-hung by a chain from the roof, - worthy personages; but between the squire of the habiliments of the road, were seated supper; and no sooner was Louis of Valois He came in by a small door behind one of the master of the mansion, than a conversaand advanced at once towards his guests, a part of which must be here put down as The sound of his footstep caused them all to illustrative of those past events, which, in 'What, Roger de Lorens!' cried the squire other, both paused, and gazed with a coun- of the Marshal, 'still hanging to the skirts of tenance of doubt and surprise on the face of thy old Lord? Do I find thee here at the end of twelve long years?

'And where could I be better, Regnault of pictured to himself the image of his friend as Gand?' replied the other. ' But thou thyself, he had before seen him, in the pride of youth old friend, art thou not at the same skirts too as when last I saw thee? How is it, that sented to them, both paused in astonishment after such long service thou art not yet a knight?

'Why, in good faith, then, replied the other. Nor was their surprise at first unmingled with some degree of doubt as to the to knighthood, and too wise to cover a state friend from whom they had so long been made money in the wars on an occasion too, like my neighbours; but, alack, friend

Roger, no sooner does the right hand put the tween us two, good Roger, I believe in none money in, than the left hand filches it out of them, except indeed all that the church again. And is it, then, really twelve long believes, and the fourteen thousand virgin years since we met? Lord, Lord! it looks martyrs.' but yesterday, when I think of those times; and yet when I count up all the things I have science, replied Roger de Lorens; but if you done since, and make old Memory notch them down on her tally, it seems like the score of a hundred years more than twelve. I remember the last day we ever saw each other; do you?'

'Do you think I could ever forget it?' said the other. 'Was it not that day when the pleasure-house of Lindenmar was burned to the ground, and our good lord's infant was burned in the flames?

'I remember it well,' replied the other, musing over the circumstances of the past; 'and I remember that my lord and Adolph of Gueldres, and all the rest of the nobles that were marching to join the Duke, saw the flames from the road; and all came willingly to help your gallant young lord. He was gallant and young then. But Adolph of Gueldres cried to let them all burn, so that the lands of Hannut might come to him. He said it laughing, indeed; but it was a bitter jest at such a minute.

'My lord heard of that soon enough,' answered the seneschal, and he never forgave it.

'Oh, but we heeded him not,' exclaimed the other: 'we all gave what aid we could. Mind you not how my lord rushed in and brought out your lady in his arms, and how she wept for her child? It was but a fortnight old, they say !'

No more, no more!' answered the other: and I will tell you more, she hever ceased to weep till death dried up her tears - poor thing !- But hark thee, Regnault, 'he added, taking the other by the arm, and drawing him a few paces aside, not only out of earshot of the rest of the persons who tenanted the hall, but also out of the broad glare of the lamp, as if what he was about to say were not matnault de Gand ! they do say that the spirits of night in his chamber at a certain hour.

'Didst thou ever see them, good Roger?'

set eyes upon them thyself?'

'God forbid!' ejaculated the seneschal fervently; 'God forbid! I would not see them for all the gold of Egypt."

'Well, then, good Roger, fear not,' replied Regnault de Gand, 'thou shalt never see them I I have heard a mighty deal of spirits, and ghosts, and apparitions, and devils; but though I have served in the countries where they are most plenty, I never could meet with one in the whole course of my life; and be-

. Why, that is believing enough in all conbelieve in no such things, I will put thee to sleep in the small room at the stairs' foot, just beneath my lord's private chamber.'

Whether this proposal was relished much or little by the worthy squire, he had made too open a profession of his incredulity to shrink from the test; and he was fain to take up his abode for the night in a low-roofed, but not inconvenient chamber, at the foot of the staircase in the square tower. He looked somewhat pale as his old companion bade him Good night; but he looked a vast deal paler the next day when they wished each other Good morning. Not one word, how-ever, did he say either of objection at first, or of comment at last; and no one ever exactly knew how he sped during the night he passed in that chamber, though, when some months after he married a buxom dame of Ghent, a report got about amongst the gossips, that though he had not actually encountered a spirit, he had heard many strange noises, and seen many a strange beam of light wandering about the apartment, coming he knew not whence, and disappearing he knew not whither.

He himself told nothing openly; and when the fair dame whom he had taken to his bosom, and who was supposed to be deeply learned in all the secrets thereof, was spoken to on the subject, she, too, affected a tone of mystery, only assuring the ingenious gossip, who tried to ferret out the details, with a solemn shake of the head, 'that' those might disbelieve the apparition of spirits who liked. As for her husband, Regnault, he had good cause to know better; though he had once been a scoffer, like all the rest of your swaggering, gallant, dare-devil men at arms.

Having now violated, in some degree, the ter for the open light :- but, hark thee, Reg- venerable art of chronology, and, in favour of the worthy squire, run somewhat forward bethat lady and her child visit our lord each fore the events of my tale, I must beg the reader to pause on his advance for a single instant; and, while the Dauphin, the Mardemanded his companion, with a smile of shal, and their respective trains, sleep sound self-satisfied incredulity. Didst thou ever in the massy walls of the castle of Hannut, to return to the party we lately left assembled round a fire in the heart of the forest,

CHAPTER IV:

A SCENE IN THE GREENWOOD,

FROM the middle of the fourteenth to the middle of the fifteenth centuries, and even.

perhaps, to a much later period, there existed, day, in time of peace they were infinitely betsword alone. strument which they held in as high a degree rous soldier. of veneration, as that in which it was regarded by the ancient Scythians.

the green forest.

between France and England, these men had to master its expression, and clothe themselves assembled in bodies of thousands and tens of with external calmness, while their hearts are of the temporary suspensions of hostilities, men. Not so, however, with good Martin talents on their own account. Scarcely a nion of the rich town of Ghent. great lord through Germany, or Burgundy, spread over the whole continent-equally in ter than the common robber, which succeeded France, in Flanders, in Italy, and in Ger- upon their extinction. There were times, inmany-a particular class of men, whose liveli- deed, when, under the guidance of some hood was obtained by the sword, and by the fierce and ruthless leader, they committed In time of hostility, they were acts which disgraced the history of human soldiers; in time of peace they were plun- nature; but upon ordinary occasions, though derers; and long habituated to reap alone the they carried into the camp a strong touch of iron harvest of war, they never dreamed of the plundering propensities of the freeturning the sword into the reaping hook- booters, yet, when war was over, they bore a sort of proceeding which they would have with them to the cavern or the wood many of considered the basest degradation of an in- the frank and gallant qualities of the chival-

It was in the hands of a body of such men, though of somewhat a better quality than In the interior of France, indeed, such a usual, that we last left Martin Fruse, the thing as peace was sometimes to be found: worthy burgher of Ghent, beginning to rebut in Germany, and its frontiers towards cover from the apprehensions which he had at France, there existed such a number of great first entertained, and to enjoy himself in provassals, and independent princes, each of portion to the rapid transition he had underwhom had the right of waging war against gone, from a feeling of terror to a sense of his neighbour—a right which they took care security. The balance of human sensation is should not fall into desuetude-that the mer- so nicely suspended, that scarcely is the cenary soldiers, who at that time infested the weight removed from our heart, when up flies world, were rarely, for any long period, under the beam, as far above as it was below, and the necessity of cultivating the arts of peace, long does it vibrate before it attains the equiin their own peculiar manner, in the heart of poise. Such, I believe, are the feelings of every human breast: though some, ashamed During the earlier part of the great struggle of the sudden transition, have power enough thousands; and, during the existence of any really as much agitated as those of other which took place from time to time, they Fruse: though, occasionally, in affairs of seized upon some town or castle, lived at free policy, he thought himself called upon to quarters in the country, and laid prince and make a bungling attempt to give an air of peasant, city and village, alike under contri- diplomatic secresy and caution to his lan-Gradually, however, these great guage and manner; and though, when bodies became scattered; kings found it more prompted by others, he could speak an equiimperatively necessary to overcome such in- vocal speech, and would fancy himself a skilternal foes than to oppose an external enemy. ful negotiator upon the faith of a doubtful The nobles also leagued together to destroy sentence, yet, in general, the feelings of his any of the great bands that remained; but heart would bubble up to the surface unrethe smaller ones, tolerated at first as a minor strained. On the present occasion, as cold evil, consequent upon the system of warfare capon and rich ham, strong Rhenish and of the day, were always in the end en-couraged, protected, and rewarded, when satisfactory kind for his future safety, his joy hostilities between any two powers rendered sparkled forth with somewhat childish glee; their services needful to each; and were not and his good friends, the robbers, in the very severely treated, when circumstances midst of the green forest, supplied, in his compelled them to exercise their military affections, the place of many a boon compa-

The stores of the sumpter-horse were soon or Flanders, had not a band of this kind- nearly consumed, but it was remarked by the more or less formidable, according to his worthy burgher, that a portion which, by wealth and power-either in his pay, or under nice computation, he judged might satisfy his protection. The character of the adven- the appetite of two hungry citizens, together his protection. The character of the adventurers, indeed, of each particular troop, greatly depended upon the disposition and manners of the lord to whom they were for some person who was not present, but who the time attached: but, upon the whole, they were a very much libelled people; and of respect. After governing his curiosity for though in actual warfare they were certainly some time, that most unrestrainable of all the purpose than the ordinary feuidal soldiers of the human passions got the better of him, and worse than the ordinary feudal soldiers of the human passions got the better of him, and,

by some sidelong questions, he endeavoured

'Oh no! no, no!' replied the personage, who had hitherto acted as the leader of the freebooters, 'we must not touch that, it is put by for our captain, who will be here presently, and will tell us,' he added, with a malicious grin, as he played upon the apprehensions of the good citizen,-'and will tell us what we are to do with thee and thine, good Master beam, and one could not choose a more airy have thee under contribution. place to hang in, on a summer's day.

was a touch of jest at the bottom of his com-Duke of Burgundy was fully as likely to inflict well enough that thou hast no heart to take a upon a rebellious subject, as the most fero- ransom from thine old companion. cious freebooter upon a wandering traveller,— caused a peculiar chilly sensation to pucker up his whole skin: but, as his danger from upon the citizen's shoulder. 'Thine own in which God had placed him. something in the arguments he deduced from just indulging in one of these merry peals Adolph of Gueldres concerning the general when a sudden rustle in the bank above rising we purposed." their head gave notice that some one was approaching.

Hold by the roots, boy,' cried a rough voice above. 'Here, set your foot here,now jump, -as far as you can-that's right! Cleared it, by St. George !- now slip down.

So here we are.

As he spoke the last words, Matthew Gournay, followed by young Hugh of Gueldres. freebooters had been regaling. Two or three of the latter had started up to welcome him, holding high one of the torches to light his descent; and as he came forward his eye degree of surprise.

How now, my merry men? he cried, laughing. 'Ye have had some sport, it would seem; but, by our Lady, I hope ye have left me a share, and something for this poor lad, who is dying of hunger.'

'Plenty, plenty for both,' replied many of the voices; 'that is to say, enough for one of the fresh supply of wine which the leathern meal at least; the next we must find elsewhere.'

'But here are some Gandois traders,' added to ascertain for whom this reservation was one of the party, 'waiting your awful decree, and trembling in every limb lest they should be hanged upon the next tree.'

'God forbid!' replied Matthew Gournay. 'We will put them to light ransoms, for rich citizens. Who is the first? Stand up, good man.—What! Martin Fruse!' he exclaimed, starting back, as the light fell upon the face of the burgher. 'My old friend Martin of the burgher. 'My old friend Martin Fruse, in whose house I lodged when I came Martin Fruse: thou art not the first syndic of to teach the men of Ghent how to get up a the weavers, I trow, who has dangled from a tumult : little did I think I should so soon ace to hang in, on a summer's day.' 'Nay, nay, good Master Gournay,' replied Though Martin Fruse perceived that there the burgher, 'right glad am I to see thee. In truth I thought I had fallen into worse hands panion's speech, yet the very thought of than thine. I know well enough, he added, dangling from a beam,—a fate which the with a somewhat doubting glance,—'I know the robbers was the more pressing and imme- ransom shall be light, and that of thy comdiate of the two, he applied himself strenu- rades also, for thy sake; but something we ously to demonstrate that it was both un- must have, if it be but to keep up good cusjust and unreasonble to hang a man either to toms. A trifle, a mere trifle, a benevolence, beam or bough, after having abetted him in as our good kings call it in England, when making himself very comfortable in the world they take it into their heads to put the clergy There was to ransom.

' Nay, but,' said Martin Fruse, whose concapon and hock, together with the terror that fidence and courage were fully restored by he evidently felt, and a degree of childish the sight of his friend's face; - 'nay, but simplicity of manner, which made the free- consider that I was taken while journeying for booters roar with laughter; and they were the sole purpose of conferring with thee and

'Well, well, we will speak further hereafter,' answered Matthew Gournay. 'That job is all over for the present; and as, doubtless, the Duke has heard of our doings, it may go hard with your purses, and with my neck, if he catch me, which please God he shall not do. But we must think of some way of getting ye all back to Ghent in safety. Now, Halbert of the hillside,' he added, adstood within one pace of the spot where the dressing one of his old band, who was probably an Englishman like himself, ' hie thee to the midway oak: thou shalt there find the old seneschal. Tell him all is safe! Bid him tarry there till to-morrow, collecting all our ran over the evidences of their supper, and friends that come thither; and, in the mean the party who had partaken of it, with some time, to send me the leathern bottles from the hollow tree. These flimsy flasks furnish scarce a draught for a boy; and, good faith, I will be merry to-night, whatever befall to-morrow. Up the bank, up the bank, he continued; ''tis but a quarter of a mile that While the messenger was gone in searchbottles implied, Matthew Gournay, and the young companion he had brought with him despatched the provisions which had been canopy. There wrap thy cloak about thee; saved by the miraclous abstinence of the freebooters; and at the same time the two flasks of Rhenish disappeared with a celerity truly astonishing. Four capacious bottles, holding about a gallon each, were soon after added to the supply, and all present were called upon to partake.

A scene of merriment and joy then succeeded, which would be impossible to describe-such, indeed, as perhaps no men ever indulged in whose lives were not held by so uncertain a tenure, -whose moments of security were not counterbalanced by so many hours of danger, and whose pleasures were not bought by so many labours and pains, that it became their only policy to quaff the bowl of joy to the very dregs, while it was yet at their lips, lest, at the first pause, circumstance, that unkind stepdame, should snatch it angrily from their hands for ever. The final explosion of their merriment was called forth by good Martin Fruse, who after showing many signs and symptoms of weary drowsiness, declared that he should like to go to bed, and asked, with much simplicity, where he was to sleep.
'Sleep!' exclaimed Matthew Gournay,

'Sleep! Why, where the fiend would you

'I mean where's your house, good Master Matthew Gournay?' rejoined Martin Fruse, with open eyes, from which all expression was banished by surprise at finding his question a matter of laughter, he knew not why. 'It's all very well to sup in the wood in a fine summer night; but its growing late and cold, and I do think we had better a great deal get us to our warm beds.

The only answer which he received to this speech, from the robbers, was a new peal of laughter; but at the same moment his nephew plucked him by the sleeve, exclaiming, 'Hist, uncle! ye only make the knaves grin; you may sleep where you are, or not sleep at all for this night. Have you not heard how these men covet no covering but the green boughs of the forest?'

'Thou art somewhat malapert, young sir, said Matthew Gournay, fixing upon him a glance into which various parts of the boy's speech, not very respectful to the freebooters, had called up a degree of fierceness that was not the general expression of his countenance; - 'thou art somewhat malapert; and, if thy uncle follow my advice, he will make thy shoulders now and then taste of the clothyard measure, else thou wilt mar his fortune shall be, so long as Matthew Gournay lives : some fine day. The boy says true, however, for I swear by the blessed Virgin, and all the good Martin; here sleepest thou this night, saints to boot, that my sword shall fight your if thou sleepest at all; so get thee under quarrels, and my lance shall be at your comyonder bank, with that broad oak-tree above mand, till I see you a righted man. But, as thy head, to guard thee from the westerly you say that the Lord of Hannut is your

ask God's blessing, and sleep sound. Tomorrow I will wake thee early, to talk of what may best be done to speed thee on thy way in safety, for many of the Duke's bands are about, and without we can get thee some good escort, thou art like to be in the same plight as the ass, who, running away from a dog, fell in with a lion.

Although Martin Fruse believed himself to be as wise as any man that ever lived, except King Solomon, he had a peculiar dislike, or rather, it may be called, a nervous antipathy, to the very name of an ass; but, when it was introduced, as on the present occasion, in the form of a simile, to exemplify his own situation, his feelings were wounded in a deep degree. In silent indignation, therefore, for he knew not what to reply, he arose, and proceeded to the spot pointed out, where, having made himself as comfortable as circumstances permitted him to do, he lay down, and, notwithstanding a firm determination not to close an eye, he was soon pouring forthea body of nasal music, which seemed intended to shame the nightingales for their silence in the autumn season.

The rest of the travellers took up with such couches as they could find; and the robbers, too, one by one, wrapped their cloaks about them, and resigned themselves to sleep. The two last who remained awake were Matthew Gournay, and young Hugh of Gueldres, whose sleep by the cascade in the morning had sufficiently removed the weariness of his limbs, to leave his mind free to rest upon the sorrows of the past and the dangers of the present.

With him the leader of the freebooters held a long, and, to them, an interesting conversation; in the course of which the boy narrated all the events which had lately occurred to him, the storming of his father's castle by the troops of Burgundy; the perils he had undergone; the difficulties of his escape; his desolation and despair when he found himself a wanderer and an outcast; his long and weary journey; his adventure with the Dauphin, whom he described as a French traveller; and the manner in which that base and artful prince had deceived him. He told it all with so much simple pathos, that he called up something very like a tear in the adventurer's clear blue eye; and, laying his broad hand affectionately on his head, he said, Never mind, my young lord, never mind; you are not without friends, and never wind, and thank Heaven thou hast so fair a cousin in the first degree : thither we must castle for him, when the black riders were about last year and what with the troops of spirits that folks say he can command, and the company of the good fellows that I shall soon gather together again, we shall be able to do something for you, no doubt. By the way, he added, seeming suddenly to bethink himself of some fact that had before escaped his attention, 'these travellers, you say, are gone to Hannut too, and under their escort these Gandois weavers may pass unsuspected on their way homeward. What if they refuse to take them? said

Hugh of Gueldres.

By the Lord, they shall eat more cold iron than they can well stomach,' replied the adventurer: 'but I must sleep, my young lord, I must sleep, if I would rise fresh to-morrow! Lend us thy hand to shift off this plastron. So saying, he disencumbered himself of his breastplate, and the other pieces of defensive armour which might have rendered his sleep uncomfortable; and, laying them down by his steel cap or basinet, which he had previously taken off, he wrapped the end of his mantle round his head, stretched himself on the ground, grasped the hilt of his dagger tight with his right hand; and, in that attitude, soon fell into as sound a sleep as if he had never tasted crime or heard of danger. The boy soon followed his example, and all was silence.

About an hour before daylight the following morning, Martin Fruse was awakened by some one shaking him by the shoulder. He roused himself with many a yawn, rose up, stretched his round limbs, which were sadly stiffened by a night's sleep upon the cold ground; and in gazing round, found, by the dim light of the expiring fire, and of one or two pine-wood torches stuck in the ground, that the party of adventurers had been considerably increased during his sleep; and that they were now all busily employed in saddling horses and preparing for a march, except Matthew Gournay himself, whose grasp it was that had awakened him. He was now informed, in a few brief words, without any precise explanation, that a means had suggested itself for sending him and his companions forward towards Ghent, with less danger than that to which they would be exposed in travelling alone. For this courtesy, and for the permission to return at all, Matthew Gournay exacted, under the name of ransom, a sum so much smaller than the fears of the worthy burgher had anticipated, that he only affected to haggle for a florin or two less, in order to keep up the custom of bargaining, so necessary to him in his mercantile capacity. A hint, however, from Matthew Gournay, that, if he said another word, the Ghent. At least, we know that he never go for help and council. I know him well, sum demanded should be tripled, soon set the top, for my good band helped to keep his matter at rest; and in a few minutes the whole party were on horseback, and on their way to the castle of Hannut.

On their arrival at the gate of the barbacan, they were instantly challenged by a sentry, who at that early hour stood watching the first grey streaks of the dawn. After various inquiries and messages to and from the interior of the castle, they were led round to a small postern, and, being made to dismount, were led, one by one, by torchlight, up one or those narrow interminable stairs still to be found in every old building whose erection can be traced to the feudal period.

CHAPTER V.

CHARLES OF BURGUNDY AND ALBERT MAURICE.

IT was after dinner on the following morning, which meal, be it remarked, took place in those days about ten o'clock,-that the Dauphin and the Marshal of Burgundy rose to bid adieu to their noble host, and offered him, in courteous terms, their thanks for the hospitable entertainment he had shown them.

'I have, my lord, a favour to ask in return, said the Lord of Hannut, 'which will leave me your debtor. It is simply this: some worthy merchants of Ghent, travelling on mercantile affairs, as I am told, arrived here this morning, and, being fearful of encountering some of the robbers, which have given to this forest not the best repute, are now waiting in the inner court, anxious to join themselves to your train, and accompany you as far as Cortenbergh, where they will leave you, and take the short cut to Ghent.

'Willingly, willingly,' replied the Dauphin; ', by my faith, if there be robbers in the wood, the more men we are, the befter.

The Marshal of Burgundy looked somewhat grave.

'I have heard some rumours, my lord,' he said, 'that the men of Ghent, who, in my young day, when I frequented this part of the country, were as turbulent a race of base mechanics as ever drove a shuttle or worked a loom, have not forgotten their old habits, and from day to day give my lord the duke some fresh anxiety.

'Nay, nay,' replied the Lord of Hannut; these men are rich burghers, returning peacefully to their own city from some profitable excursion.

'Oh, let us have them by all means!' exclaimed Louis, who possibly might have his own views, even at that time, in cultivating a good understanding with the people of

ceased to keep up some correspondence with into tumults, though the time was not yet Flanders, from the time of his exile among pation. them, to the last hour of his life. 'Oh! let have too few florins in my purse to lose any

The Marshal of Burgundy signified his assent by a low inclination of the head; though it was evident from his whole manner, that he was not at all pleased with the new companions thus joined to his band; and would at once have rejected the proposal, had good manners towards his host, or etiquette to-any further opposition.

he conducted them towards the court-yard,

sary.

and the Lord of Neufchatel thanked his old and then, offering his arm to the Duchess, friend more frankly; but said, he should like wished to lead her into the palace. to see the boldest freebooter that ever was method of proceeding was not at all permitted born stand before the Marshal of Burgundy, by the mistress of the most ceremonious court, though he had but four lances and four horse- at that time, in Europe; and a series of boys in his train. They were by this time in formal courtesies began, and endured for a the court-yard; and Louis greeted the burgh- mortal half hour, such as would have slain ers, whom he found waiting, with a familiar any queen in modern Europe. At length, the cordiality, well calculated to win their hearts, resistance of the Duchess was vanquished by without diminishing his own dignity. The the Dauphin taking her by the hand, and Marshal of Burgundy, on the contrary, spoke thus leading her forward, as he exclaimed: not; but looked on them with a grim and somewhat contemptuous smile; muttering towards one who is now the poorest gentlebetween his teeth, with all the haughtiness of man of all the realm of France, and knows a feudal noble of that day. 'The rascallion not where to find a refuge, except with you communes! they are dressed as proudly as and my fair uncle of Burgundy. lords of the first degree!'

now and then by a sneer, it is true; but, whenever any occasion presented itself for prejudices of education. Nevertheless, his nesses of his age. pride offended more than his services pleased; journey, the two parties separated at Corten-the burghers of the manufacturing towns of come for a successful struggle for emanci-

From Cortenbergh, the Dauphin and his us have them by all means. Think of the companions rode on towards Brussels, sendrobbers, my Lord Marshal! By my faith! I ing forward a messenger to inform the Duke of Burgundy of their approach; but, before they reached the gates of the town, they received information that the prince whom they sought was even then in the field against the people of Utrecht. Nevertheless, as a safe asylum in Brussels was all that Louis demanded, he rode on upon his way; and, being admitted at once within the walls of the town, proceeded towards the palace. His coming wards the Dauphin, permitted him to make had been notified to the Duchess Isabella and, on arriving at the barriers which at that So necessary do I think caution against time separated the dwelling of every prince or the freebooters, my lords,' said their host, as great noble from the common streets of the town, he found that Princess, together with where their horses stood saddled, 'that I the young and beautiful Countess of Charolois have ordered ten spears of my own to accom- - the wife of him afterwards famous as pany you to the verge of the forest. They Charles the Bold-waiting to do honour to will join you at the little town of Hannut, the heir of the French throne. No sooner about half a mile distant; and will remain did he perceive them, than, springing from with you as long as you may think it neces- his horse, he advanced with courtly grace, and gailantly saluted the cheek of every one of the Louis returned his thanks in courtly terms; fair bevy who had descended to welcome him;

'Nay, nay, lady, you are over-ceremonious

We might now pursue Louis XI. through Notwithstanding his offensive pride, the all his cunning intrigues at the court of Bur-Lord of Neufchatel was far from freating the gundy: for, though then a young man, with burghers with any real unkindness; and, after the ardent blood of youth mingling strangely the whole party had mounted, and left the in his veins, with the cold serpent-like sanies castle of Hannut, he gratified himself every of policy, yet his nature was the same artful nature then that it appeared in after years; and treachery and artifice were as familiar to contributing to their comfort, or rendering his mind while combined with the passions them a substantial service, the natural cour- and follies of early life, as they were when tesy of a chivalrous heart got the better of the connected with the superstitions and weak-

At present, however, it is neither with Louis and when, after a quiet and uninterrupted nor with the Duke of Burgundy, nor with his warlike son, that we have principally to do, bergh, though the marshal left them as a set but rather with the young Countess of Charoof men on whom he should never waste lois; then in that interesting situation when another thought, they remembered him long the hopes of a husband and a nation are fixed as one of those proud tyrants whose insults upon a coming event, which, with danger to and oppression often goaded the people the mother, is to give an heir to the throne and to the love of both sovereign and burghers and nobles, from the united trades,

The subjects of Burgundy watched anx- even then in Brussels, for the purpose of iously, till at length, in the month of Febru- imploring mercy and forgiveness. The young ary, on St. Valentine's eve, was born Mary of Count, whose hasty and passionate nature Burgundy—the only child that ever blessed was prone to be irritated by anything that the bed of Charles the Bold. The baptism hurried or excited him, had been in such was appointed to take place as soon as a state of fretful impatience during the prepossible: and the Dauphin was invited to parations for the baptism of his child, that his hold at the font the infant Princess, whose wiser counsellors, who wished much that he after being his ambition was destined to ren- should deal clemently with the Gandois, had der miserable. Now, however, all was joy concealed their arrival, in hopes of a more and festivity; and magnificent presents, and favourable moment presenting itself. splendid preparations, evinced how much the Flemish citizens shared, or would have seemed expectation; and, after the ceremony was to share, in the happiness of their Duke and over, and all the splendour he could have his family. Even the people of Utrecht, so wished had been displayed, without cloud or lately in rebellion, vied with Bruges and Brus- spot, on the christening of his child, the sels, Ghent and Ypres, in offering rich testi- heart of the Count seemed to expand, and he monies of their gladness; and Brussels itself gave himself up entirely to the joy of the was one scene of gorgeous splendour during occasion. His friends and attendants deter-the whole day of the christening. The centre mined to seize the moment while this favourof the great street, from the palace to the able mood continued. After the infant had church of Cobergh, was enclosed within rail- been carried back from the church and ings breast-high; and, towards night, four presented to its mother, and after the cup hundred of the citizens, holding lighted and drageoir had been handed with formal torches of pure wax in their hands, were ceremony to each of the guests, the Lord of stationed along the line. A hundred servants Ravestein called the Prince's attention to of the house of Burgundy, furnished also with a petition he held from his father's humble ompous ceremonies of that day, as they are sation had taken place, and at once entered written at full in the very elaborate account the apartment in which the burghers were asgiven by Eleonore of Poitiers. Suffice it to sembled. There was something in the storn say, such joy and profusion never before haste of his stride, as he advanced into the reigned in Brussels. The streets of the city room, which boded little good to the suppliflowed with wine, and blazed with bonfires.

Every rich citizen gathered round his glowing favourable pressage.

The deputation consisted of short the streets of the city and the firedes and relations of his. hearth all the friends and relations of his The deputation consisted of about twenty house. Comfits and spiced hippocras fumed persons, chosen from all ranks; and amongst in every dwelling; and the christening of them were two or three who had followed

ing in the memory of men.

and from the incorporation of weavers-were

They were not, indeed, deceived in this of the house of Burgundy, furnished also with a petition ne neited from his father's numble torches, lined the isles of the church, and a vassals, the citizens of Ghent; and seeing hundred more were soon seen issuing from that he received the paper with a smile, the palace gates, followed by as splendid a cortège as the world ever beheld. The Duchess of Burgundy herself, supported by the Dauphin, carried her son's child to the font; and all the nobles of that brilliant court followed on foot to the church. It is not necessary here to describe the the Countess's chamber, in which this conver-

Mary of Burgundy became an epoch of rejoic- to the presence of the Prince from motives of curiosity, and a desire, for once, to see the One event of that night, however, must be splendours of a royal court, though the recepnoticed. The fate of the city of Ghent, tion of the whole party was not likely to be whose project of revolt had, in spite of all prevery gratifying. Amongst the principal percautions, become known to the Duke Philip sonages of the deputation appeared our good had been left in the hands of the Count of friend Martin Fruse, who had brought with Charolois, that prince's son; and a deputa- him his nephew, Albert Maurice; and the tion from what were then called the three other persons whom we have seen with him in members of Ghent-that is to say,* from the the forest of Hannut bore him company also * Although almost all the superficial books of modern date which refer to the ancient state of dent, speak of these three members or states, as tomed to harangue each other, either in statement in the text is correct, which may be ascer- a good conceit of their own powers of oratory, the ecclesiastics, the nobles, and the commons; the the town house or the market place, and had tained by referring to the Chronicles of George yet fear, which, of all the affections of the Chatellain, ad ann. 1467.

human mind, is the greatest promoter of Ravestein endeavoured to persuade his cousin, they were about to make to one of their own rebellion. body, they had hired a professional advocate, before their offended Prince.

rolois; 'range out, and let me see the lovely around him, not the effect of hasty wrath, our father's subjects to revolt.'

By his orders, the deputies from Ghent day, and calling David, Solo- Ghent, I shall deal as towards men.' mon, and many others, both sacred and propentant citizens of Ghent.

little attention to the studied and unnatural

volted Gandois reduced.

When the orator had concluded, the Count replied,- 'Men of Ghent, I have heard that escape without due punishment; for know, that it is as much the duty of a prince to innocent.

He paused, and no one ventured to reply, except the boy Albert Maurice, who, grasping almost all ages or ranks then wore, muttered, in a tone not quite inaudible, the words, 'Insolent tyrant!

he struck the youth a blow, with the palm of or three stout attendants, who had followed his open hand, which laid him almost senseless on the ground.

A momentary confusion now ensued; the humility, had so completely lessened their Charles of Burgundy, to quit the apartment, confidence in their own gift of eloquence, terrified lest he should proceed to measures that, instead of intrusting the supplications which would throw the Gandois into open

He was mistaken, however; the rage of the from a different town, to plead their cause prince had evaporated in the blow he had struck; and, somewhat ashamed of the act 'Range out, Messires, range out!' were of passion he had committed, he endeavoured the first ungracious words of the Count de Cha- to make it seem, both to himself and to those faces of the men who would fain have excited which it really was, -but the deliberate punishment of an insolent boy.

To Ravestein's remonstrances and entreaties were arranged in a semicircle before him; for him to leave the apartment, he replied by and, according to etiquette, the whole party a loud laugh, demanding, Thinkest thou I dropped upon one knee; though some went could be moved to serious anger by a malafarther, and bent both to the ground. In the pert lad like that? He spoke like a spoiled mean time, their advocate pronounced a long, boy, and I have given him the chastisement florid, and frothy harangue, after the manner suited to a spoiled boy: with these men of

He was about to proceed, and was resumfane, to his aid as examples of clemency, be- ing the stern air with which he had formerly sought the Count to show mercy to the re- addressed the deputies, when the Dauphin, stepping forward, spoke to him in a low tone, The heir of Burgundy appeared to give as if to prevent his intercession from being apparent, though his gesture and manner, oration of the advocate, but continued rolling were quite sufficient to show the burghers his eyes over the countenances of the sup- that he was pleading on their behalf. The plicants, with a bent brow, and a smile, Count of Charolois had not yet learned all which—as a smile always proceeds from some the intricate duplicity of Louis's character, pleasurable emotion-could only arise from and took it for granted that, while he interthe gratification of pride and revenge, at the ceded for the people of Ghent, he did reallystate of abasement to which he saw the re- as he affected to do-desire that they should be ignorant of his generous efforts in their

'Well, be it so, my princely cousin,' he rein all times ye have been turbulent, dis- plied, smoothing his ruffled brow; 'the godcontented, factious, like a snarling cur that father of my child shall not be refused his snaps at the hand that feeds it, but crouches first request to me, upon the very day of her beneath the lash: think not that you shall baptism; but, by my faith! the honour of this good act shall rest where it is due, with you, not with me. Know, men of Ghent, punish the criminal, as to protect the that you have a better advocate here, than this man of many words, whom ye have brought to plead your cause. My noble cousin, Louis of France, condescends to inthe hilt of the small dagger, which persons of tercede for you, and ye shall be pardoned upon the payment of a moderate fine. But, remember! offend not again; for, by the Lord that lives! if ye do, I will hang ten of Whether these words caught the ear of each of your estates over the gates of the any one else or not, they were at all events city. What have ye there? he added sudloud enough to reach that of the Count de denly, pointing to some large objects, wrapped Charolois; and, taking one stride forward, in violet coloured linen, and carried by two the men of Ghent to the Prince's presence; 'what have ye there?'

'A humble offering, my lord the Count,' nobles and attendants interposed, to prevent replied Martin Fruse, rising from his knees, any farther act of unprincely violence. The and walking towards the object which had boy was hurried away out of the room; several attracted the attention of the Count de Charoof the deputies made their escape, fearing the lois; 'a humble offering from the city of immediate consequence; and the Count of Ghent to our noble Count, upon the birth of cate forgot to mention all about it in his it to atoms. What he muttered at the same speech.

Count; 'for had he attempted to bribe me to turn him deadly pale; and after having tasted forget justice, I doubt much whether one of of the Count's wine, that he might not be

Count,' replied Martin Fruse, whose all-en- ance, till he had got the boy free of the walls grossing admiration of the rich presents they of the palace. had brought made him insensible to the stern tone in which the Count had been speaking. 'Only look at them; they are so beautiful and so saying, he removed the linen which covered them, and exposed to view three large and richly chased vases of massive silver. And certainly their effect upon all present very well justified the commendations which he had bestowed upon their beauty, and his censure of the advocate for not mentioning them before.

Both Charles of Burgundy and the Dauphin took an involuntary step forward, to look at shall leave to unravel themselves in the course them more nearly. But the eyes of Louis, who was fonder of the examination of the human heart, than of the finest piece of as the characters which we have introduced workmanship ever produced by the hands of already, and it will be seldom found that, at man, were soon turned to the face of his the end of so great a lapse of time, the whole cousin; and, as he marked the evident admiration which was therein expressed, he less, such was the case in the present in-said, with a frank laugh which covered well stance. Time, the great enemy of man, and the sneer that was lurking in his speech,— of all man's works, had not leagued himself the sneer that was lurking in his speech,- cate was in the wrong.'

'Good troth, but I think so too,' replied the Count, joining in the laugh. Well, my friends,' he continued, addressing the deputies man; the man of middle age was bowed bein a very different tone from that which he neath the load of years; and the infant in the had formerly used; 'get you gone, and be cradle had reached the blossoming days of cautious for the future how ye listen to the womanhood. delusive words of vain and ambitious men: the master of our household will see that ye have just commemorated, we shall speak in are well entertained with white bread, good the first place, before proceeding to notice the wine, and all the dainties of a christening; and as for the boy I struck, he added, taking characters which we have brought upon the a gold brooch or fermail from the bosom scene. Her infancy passed in the midst of of his own vest, and putting it into the hands prosperity and happiness, while the territories of Martin Fruse, 'give him that to heal the which she was destined to inherit flourished blow. There, set down the vases on that under the dominion of her grandfather,—that table. We thank you for them; and, by our wise and virtuous prince, who redeemed the faith! we will show them to our lady there errors of his early years by the generous within.'

of Ghent withdrew, very well satisfied to have his native subjects, the noble appellation of obtained pardon on easy terms. Young Al- Philip the Good ;-and while under the eye of bert Maurice was found below, fully re- her own gentle mother, her education procovered from the blow he had received; but ceeded in calm tranquillity, and her home reit was in no degree effaced from his memory. posed in peace. His uncle immediately presented him with Scarcely had she attained the age of ten the rich brooch which the Count had sent, years, however, ere, left alone under the guidnever doubting but the boy would be de- ance of a severe and imperious father, she lighted with the present; but, the moment found that, according to the common fate of he received it, he dashed it down upon the those in the highest stations, her lot was to be his fair daughter; though that foolish advo- ground, and setting his foot upon it, trampled time was unheard by any one but his uncle. 'Well for ye that he did so !' replied the The effect upon him, however, was such as to the deputies of Ghent would have quitted suspected of disaffection, he hurried his these palace walls alive. But only look at them, my Lord the citizen of Brussels, miserable, to all appear-

CHAPTER VI.

THE GIRLHOOD OF MARY OF BURGUNDY.

WE have now concluded one period of our tale, and must beg the reader to leap boldly over twenty years. In regard to the events which intervened, of some we shall here give a slight sketch before proceeding; some we of the after history.

Take any body of men, as many in number are still upon the busy stage of life; neverthe-By my faith! fair cousin, I think the advo- with death against any of those whom I have particularly noticed. In other respects, however, he had not failed to do his accustomed work. The youth had grown up into the

Of her, then, whose birth and baptism we change which had occurred in the other patriotism of his latter days, and both merited With many a lowly reverence the men and obtained, from neighbouring princes and anything but happy. Gentle, kind, obedient, those qualities of mind and person calculated least, peace, by yielding to duty. Her hopes and expectations were, nevertheless, in vain. The continual perils to which Charles the Bold exposed himself, of course, kept his family in constant alarm and agitation; and the frequent and capricious changes of his policy, without obtaining for himself or his country any real advantage, only served to wring his daughter's heart.

After the death of his second wife, Isabel de Bourbon, the desire of a male heir induced him speedily to marry again; and the hatred which he had by that time conceived for Louis XI. made him choose for his bride, His hopes of a son were disappointed; but upon his daughter, Mary of Burgundy, his marriage conferred an inestimable benefit. Margaret of York fully replaced in kindness and affection the mother she had lost; and habituated early herself to cares, to sorrows, and to dangers, she instilled into the mind of her step-daughter that patient fortitude which she had acquired in so bitter a school; and taught her, in all circumstances, both to bear up against despair, and to endure without complaint.

As years rolled on, the hand of the undoubted heiress of all Burgundy and Flanders became, of course, an object of ambition to many of the princes of Europe; and from the time that Mary reached the age of fifteen, to obtain possession of her person, was a matter of open negotiation and subtle intrigue to all the neighbouring sovereigns. The brother of the King of France, the Duke of Calabria, the Prince of Tarentum, and the Duke of Savoy, became successively the suitors for her hand; and her father, to each and all, held out hopes and expectations, which he either never intended to fulfil, or found cause to disappoint. The most selfish of sovereigns, and perhaps, of men, the feelings of his child were never consulted throughout the whole transactions which followed. He looked upon her simply as an object of policy-a human seal, which, at his will, was to be affixed to the charter of conveyance, destined to give to some neighbouring prince the succession to his vast dominions.

Luckily, however, it so happened, that Mary had made up her mind to her fate, and so guarded her own heart and feelings, that all men remained indifferent to her till the sanction of her father warranted the gift of her affections. Thus she beheld treaties commenced and broken, her hand promised and refused, without either pain or pleasure, she endeavoured, by making her inclinations to gain her heart. Brave, chivalrous, and acthe slaves of her father's will, to obtain, at complished, graceful and well-formed in person, and handsome in features, Maximilian, son of the Emperor Frederick, had, at the same time, all that native kindness of heart, which, giving a gentle courtesy to the whole demeanour, is far more winning than the most splendid acquirements; and such qualities might have been quite sufficient to win the heart of the heiress of Burgundy. Other things, indeed, were required by her father: but besides these personal qualities, he was the son of the richest monarch in Europe, the heir of the Duchy of Austria, and would be, undoubtedly, successor to the imperial throne itself. Every object seemed attained by such Margaret of York, the sister of the King of an alliance; and when, after appearing for two years successively at the court of Burgundy, Maximilian demanded the hand of the beautiful heiress of the land, Mary, for the first time, heard with joy that it was promised to the new aspirant.

Long negotiations succeeded; and it was agreed that the Duchy of Burgundy, freed from its homage to the crown of France, should be erected into an independent kingdom.

A grand meeting of the Imperial and Burgundian courts was appointed at Treves for the conclusion of the marriage; and Charles the Bold, with his daughter, accompanied by a train of unrivalled splendour, set out for the place of rendezvous. Mary's heart beat high as she entered the ancient city; and, now taught to look upon Maximilian as her future husband, she yielded her whole heart to the influence of her first affection. greedy ambition of her father was destined to overthrow all those airy fabrics of happiness, of which her hopes, and her imagination, had been the architects. Charles insisted that the title of King should be granted to him previous to his daughter's marriage; while the Emperor, who had watched his capricious changes on other occasions, with a jealous and somewhat indignant eye, refused to confer the title he sought, till the hand of the heiress of Burgundy was irrevocably bestowed upon his son. Charles argued and railed, and threatened in vain; and at length the Emperor, wearied with his pertinacity, and offended by his intemperate violence, suddenly broke up his court, and left him, mad with rage and disappointment, to carry back his daughter to Brussels, with a heart bleeding in secret with the cruel wounds it had received.

Other negotiations succeeded with other princes; and though Mary heard, with apprehension and terror, of each new proposal, till, at length, a suitor appeared, who, with all the capricious uncertainty of her father's disthose advantages which could satisfy the poliposition saved her from the still bitterer tical ambition of her father, posse sed all pangs of yielding her hand to another, while her heart was really given to Maximi- gance of some of his young compeers.

or were abandoned; and while her father hastened to the last fatal field, where his military renown was extinguished in his blood, she remained with her gentle step-mother in Ghent, to weep the perils to which her parent's mad ambition exposed him, and to tremble at the sight of every packet that reached her from the Burgundian camp.

Such were the changes and events which had affected the fate of Mary of Burgundy, since we depicted her as an infant, born shortly after the arrival of the Dauphin at the Court of Brussels. Over the Dauphin himself, greater alterations still had come in the course of passing years. From an exiled prince, he had become the king of a mighty nation; and time had stolen away all the graces of youth, and all those better feelings, and nobler emotions, which, in the freshness of early life, are more or less imparted to every human being, whatever may be the portion of selfish cunning added to neutralise them. However beneficial might be his policy to the country over which he ruled, however much his acts might advance the progress of society in Europe, and lead forward the world to a state of more general freedom and civilisation, his objects were mean and personal, and individual ambition of the lowest kind was the motive for all his cunning scheme and artful policy. An immortal pen has, in our own day, portrayed his character with unequalled skill; and of Louis XI. at this period of his life nothing farther can be said than that he was the Louis XI. of Sir Walter Scott.

Of those who accompanied him on his journey, Thibalt of Neufchâtel, Marshal of Burgundy, still remained—a weather-beaten warrior, and still, in a certain sense, a haughty noble. Though age, with its infirmities, had somewhat broken his strength, and had also softened his heart, he was ready at all times, nevertheless, to spring into the saddle at the trumpet's call: but so much, indeed, had he learned to look upon the inferior ranks with a milder eye, that he had become rather popular than otherwise; and amongst the peasants and burghers was generally known, at this time, by the name of good Count Thibalt.

The germ of pride still remained, but its operation was directed in a different manner: and young nobles, and new soldiers, who were not always inclined to pay as much respect to the old officer's opinion as he thought of the haughty vexations which they continu-his due, now monopolised the scorn which he ally exercised upon the lower classes; but he among the lower classes, and the difference fearful and deadly contest must arise between with which they invariably treated him, con-himself and the oppressors of his class, and trasting strongly with the self-sufficient arro- strove anxiously, and with a feeling of awe, to

lian.

In the mean time disputes and wars succeeded; the projects of her marriage languished complacent to those whom he had formerly despised.

On good Martin Fruse, the passing of twenty years had brought, if not a green, at least a fat old age. He was not unwieldy, how-ever; was rosy, and well respected amongst his fellow citizens for his wealth, for his wisdom, and for his many memories of the mighty past; and, in short, good Martin Fruse was, in person and appearance, a man who had gone happily through many changes, increasing in riches, honour, and comfort, with very few cares to prey upon his mind, and scarcely an ailment through life to shatter his body. As he had proceeded, however, experience had done its work; and while he had become wiser, and had really obtained a greater insight into affairs of policy, he had grown less vain, and willingly restrained his personal efforts to composing the municipal squabbles of his native city, and directing the efforts of his townsmen for the extension of their commerce and the improvement of their manufactures.

His nephew, Albert Maurice, had been differently changed by the wand of the enchanter Time. His mind, indeed, was one of those firm, fixed, and steadfast essences, on which the passing of years make but little alteration except by expanding their capabilities by the exercise of their powers. From a boy, it is true, he had grown into a powerful and handsome man; and though, in partnership with his uncle, he held the peaceful station of a rich merchant of Ghent, yet he was skilled in all military exercises; and when the com-munes of Flanders had been called to the field, on pressing occasions, amongst the various struggles of that eventful period, he had shown knowledge, courage, and address, which had excited the wonder, and perhaps the jealousy, of many of those noble warriors who looked upon the trade of war as peculiarly their own. Whenever he returned home again, however, from the camp, he sunk at once into the citizen; seemed to forget or to despise his military skill; and, though gay and splendid amongst his own class, far from courting popularity, he appeared to conceal, purposely, the deep thoughts and striking qualities of his mind. Once or twice, indeed, he had been heard to burst into an eloquent and indignant rebuke to some of the nobles, on the occasion formerly bestowed upon the citizens; while seemed to regret his words as soon as spoken; the degree of popularity he had lately acquired and, -as if he knew that, at some time, a matter of quarrel with the nobility of Ghent, sphere of all he knew. or with the officers of the Duke of Burgundy.

place. house was carrying on with the merchant him a far greater degree of popularity than Lords of Venice. In that sweet climate, the any general familiarity could have won. nurse of arts and too often of crimes, he manner, unknown to the burghers of his leads the man, whose mind is so constituted, native place. He came home, skilled in many to seek to rise into the class above him: but arts with which they were unacquainted, both his pride and his ambition were too poand had his spirit been less powerful, his tent for that. He was proud of the very diftalents less commanding, it is not improbable ference between his station and himself-he that his fellow citizens might have contemned had a deep and settled love, too, of his or laughed at acquirements which they had not country, and even of his class; and while his learned to appreciate, and might have scorned ambition was of a quality which would have the travelled coxcomb who brought home snatched at empire had there been a hope strange modes and fashions to his native of success, the hatred and contempt in which land. But Albert Maurice made a show he held the nobles were far too great for him of none; and it was only upon long solicitation to covet aught but the power to trample them or on some moment of joyous festivity, that down amongst those ranks whom they now he would sing the sweet songs of a softer oppressed, and accompany himself with instru-Such had some of the characters, whom we

every quality, both of mind and body, to those around him, might have been a blessing, had and had changed the flower, and the not felt it himself; but he did feel it, and of course was discontented,—and who can there are others yet to be spoken of, and to doubt that anything which makes man distinct the ready fruit and the ripened ear. But contented with his state, without giving him the certainty of a better, is a curse? All eves turned upon him with satisfaction; and many a soft, kind heart would willingly have given itself to him; but his thoughts were of another kind, and he could see none to love amongst the many by whom he was admired. The fair girls of Ghent—and many a fair girl was THE withering power of time, which in brief delay it as long as possible, -he avoided all mind; and he found none such within the

Shut out by circumstance from the higher He seemed desirous of closing his eyes to ranks of society, the finer feelings, the better subjects of offence; and, when he heard of a aspirations of his soul were matter for a thoubrawl in any neighbouring part of the town, sand disgusts; and though a native sense of or when the other young citizens called upon what is noble in itself, and just to others, him to take the lead in their frequent tumults, made him laboriously conceal the very superhe would either quit the place for the time, riority which he felt, as well as its conor shut himself sternly in his own dwelling, sequences, yet the conversation, the manners, in order to avoid any participation in the the thoughts, of those around him - even dangerous occurrences that were taking those with whom he was most intimately allied-were constant sources of hidden pain On one of these occasions, when the city of and annoyance. He lived amongst the people Ghent, though not in open revolt, was keep- of Ghent, and he strove to live with them; and ing up an angry discussion with the high so far did he succeed, that though his talents officers of the Duke, Albert Maurice, then in and his occasional reserve made his townsfolk his twenty-fourth year, obtained his uncle's look upon him with no small reverence, the consent to travel into Italy, for the purpose of urbanity of his manners, when brought into negotiating some transactions which their casual contact with the other citizens, gained

The union of pride and ambition-and he acquired an elegance of taste, and a grace of had both qualities in his bosom-usually ments unknown in his own country.

His personal beauty, and the fascinating of life, become under the passing of twenty grace of his manners, made him seem a crea-years. Time, in short, had done his wonted ture of a different race, and his superiority in work on all—had expanded the bud and the

CHAPTER VII.

then, and is now, within its walls—thought space can make such havoc on man, and all him cold and proud, and blamed him for what man's works, that friend shall scarce know was his misfortune, not his fault. His heart friend, and grass shall have swallowed up the was one on which love might have taken as firm highways, is impotent against the ever renewa hold as on that of any man that ever burned ing power of Nature; and in the forest of or died for woman since the world began: Hannut, the twenty years which had passed but he sought for his equal, -I do not mean seemed scarcely to have made the difference in rank, for that he never heeded-but in of a day, Green oaks were withered, it is true; the lightning had scathed the pine and mount; and when, after having rendered his rent the beech; the woodman's axe had been service to the lady, the young cavalier turned busy here and there; but, in constant succes- to offer him his arm also, with a sort of half sion, the children of the wood had grown up apology for not having done so, he replied, to take the place of those which had fallen; smiling, and the most discerning eye could scarce have traced a single change in all the forest scene think'st thou I have so far forgotten my around.

Days seemed to be altered, however, and manners to have changed in the forest of Hannut; for, instead of very equivocal look- and pointing to the green short turf which ing soldiers and travellers, who wandered on carpeted the bank of the stream just below with fear and trembling, there was now to be seen, near the very same cascade by whose side we opened this book, a gay, light party, whose thoughts appeared all of joy, and to and paused by the side of the stream.

The first whom we shall notice—a powerful young cavalier, who might be in the thirtieth year of his age, who might be less, sun-burnt, but naturally fair, strong in all his limbs, but The conversation was gay and lively, easy and graceful in his movements—sprang especially between the two younger persons to the ground as they approached the waterfall; and laying his hand on the gilded bridle of a white jennet, that cantered on by his side, assisted the person who rode it to dis-

She was a fair, beautiful girl, of about eighteen years of age, round whose broad white forehead fell clusters of glossy light brown hair; her eyebrows and her eyelashes, however, were dark; and through the long less gentle—but it was of that light and play-deep fringe of the latter looked forth a pair of ful character, under which very deep and blue and laughing eyes—which beamed with powerful attachment sometimes endeavours to the same merry happiness that curled the arch of her sweet lips.

Two of the attendants who followed, sprang forward to hold the bridle and the stirrup of the third person of the party, who dismounted and appreciated by her companion, who, more slowly, as became the gravity of his years. Time, indeed, had not broken and had hardly bent him; but evidences of the iron-handed conqueror's progress were to heart within. be traced in the snowy hair and beard, which had once been of the deepest black; and in the long furrows deeply traced along the once some fresh demand for new, or greater acsmooth brow. In other respects, the Lord of knowledgment, that the lady replied to a Hannut was but little changed. The same half-whispered speech,dark, grave cast of countenance remained; the same spare, but vigorous form; though, indeed, without appearing to stoop, his height for, as we are to be married whether we love seemed somewhat diminished since last we brought him before the reader's eyes. A gleam of affectionate pleasure lighted up his countenance as he marked the graceful gal- her companion's face, with a look of malicious lantry with which his young companion aided inquiry, as if to see what effect the lukewarm-the fair girl who accompanied them to dis-ness of her speech would produce upon a

'Thou art better employed, dear boy; chivalry as to grudge the attention thou bestowest upon a lady. Here, spread out here,' he continued, turning to the attendants, the waterfall; 'we could not find a better place for our meal than here.

By the birds which they carried on their wrists, it was evident that the whole party whom terror seemed perfectly a stranger, had been flying their hawks, the favourite That party consisted of only three persons, amusement, at that time, of the higher classes besides their attendants; and mounted on throughout Flanders. They now, however, splendid horses, whose high spirit, though seated themselves to a sort of sylvan meal, bowed to the most complete obedience to which was spread upon the turf by the attendman's will, was not in the slightest degree ants, who, with that mixture of familiarity diminished, they rode gaily across the bridge, and respect which were usual and perfectly compatible with each other in those days, and in such sports, sat down with the persons of higher rank, at once to partake of their fare, and assist them at their meal.

whom we have noticed. They were evidently in habits of intimacy; and on his part there appeared that tender but cheerful attention to his fair companion, which argued feelings of a somewhat warmer nature than kindred affection, yet without any of that apprehension which love—if the return be doubtful—is sure to display. Her manner was of a different kind; it was not less affectionate-it was not conceal itself-that timidity which hides itself in boldness-a consciousness of feeling deeply, which sometimes leads to the assumption of feeling little. It was understood, however, possibly, had taken some more serious moment, when the light and active guardian of the casket slept, to pry into the secret of the

'Certainly, dear Hugh! Can you doubt it? I will try, with all my mind, to love you; each other or not, it is but good policy to strive to love each other, if it be possible.

And as she spoke, she fixed her eyes upon heart she knew to be sufficiently suscept- in the direction which hers had taken. There

He only laughed, nowever, and replied,these green woods, and make me think you love me better than you do.

at the bright court of France, and art, I know, a master of the gaie science. Sing the Lord of Hannut; 'and have sent poor Hugh light lay you sang yester evening; or some de Mortmar on a foolish errand. other, if you know one. It matters not much which.

question, than an inquiring glance towards some of the men up to aid poor Hugh; for, seech his mistress to sing to him in each of young lord. the various seasons of the year. His song, though in a different language, was somewhat on his part, the Lord of Hannut only smiled to the following effect :-

SONG.

Sing to me in the days of spring-time, beloved; In those days of sweetness, oh, sing to me! When all things by one glad spirit are moved, From the sky-lark to the bee.

Sing to me in the days of summer-time, dearest; In those days of fire, oh, sing to me then! When suns are brightest, and skies are clearest, Sing, sing in the woods again.

Sing to me still in the autumn's glory; In the golden fall-time, oh, be not mute! Some sweet, wild ditty from ancient story, That well with the time may suit.

Sing to me still in the hours of sadness, When winter across the sky is driven; But sing not the wild tones of mirth and gladness, Then sing of peace and heaven.

'A pretty song enough for a man to sing,' observed the young lady, as her lover concluded; 'but, as I do not choose to be dictated to by anybody else, I shall just sing you bank,—there, there !'

was, indeed, a rustle heard amongst the trees; and a stone or two, detached from above, 'Sing me a song, then, dear Alice, to cheer rolled down the crag, and plunged into the stream at its foot. But no one was to be seen; and, after gazing for a moment in 'Not I, indeed,' replied the young lady. silence, the lover beckoned one of the attend'In the first place, I would not cheat thee for ants to follow, and bounding up the most inthe world; and in the next place, neither accessible part of the cliff, notwithstanding song, nor pastourelle, nor sirvente, nor vire- the fair girl's entreaty to forbear, he plunged lai, will I ever sing, till I am asked in song into the brushwood, in pursuit of the person myself. Sing, sing, Hugh! Thou hast been who had disturbed their tranquillity.

'You are dreaming, my fair Alice,' said the

'Nay, indeed, uncle,' replied Alice, 'I dreamed not at all. I am not one to dream 'Be it so, if thou wilt sing afterwards,' re- in such a sort. For God's sake! bid some plied the young cavalier; and without farther one ride to bring us assistance, and send the Lord of Hannut, he sang, in a full, rich, as sure as I live, I saw two or three faces with melodious voice, one of the common songs of steel caps above, looking through the branches the day; but which was not inapplicable to of the trees. Hark! do you not hear voices? her speech, as in it a lover is supposed to be- Climb up, sirs, if you be men, and aid your

> The attendants looked to the Baron; and with an air of incredulity; when, much, indeed, to the surprise of Alice, her lover appeared above the moment after; and, springing easily down the rock, declared that all was clear beyond.

She gazed on him for a moment in serious silence, and then merely replied, - 'It is very strange!' Hugh de Mortmar cast himself down again by her side, and once more pressed her to sing; but it was in vain. Alice was evidently agitated and alarmed; and finding it impossible to shake off her terror, she besought her uncle to break up the party and return to the castle, notwithstanding the assurances of all parties that she must have been deceived by the waving of some of the boughs, or the misty spray of the cataract. Finding, at length, that to reason with her was in vain, her uncle agreed to return; and the horses being led forward, the whole party remounted, and, with their hawks once more upon their hands, made the best of their way back towards the castle of Hannut. such a song as suits me myself, whether in For the first two or three miles, however, season or out of season. What say you, dear- Alice continued anxiously to watch every est uncle?' she added, turning to the Lord of opening of the trees on either side of the road; Hannut; and laying the fair rounded fingers remaining in such a state of alarm, that her of her soft hand upon his, 'What shall I sing falcon's wings were continually flapping, from him? and as she spoke, she raised her eyes the agitated haste with which she turned to towards the sky, as if trying to remember gaze on every object that they passed on the some particular song from amongst the many road. It was only when they came within that she knew; but scarcely had she done so, sight of the vassal town, and the castle on its when an involuntary cry burst from her lips, high rock, about half a mile beyond, that she - Good God!' she exclaimed, 'there are seemed to consider herself in safety; and the armed men looking at us from the top of the long deep breath she drew, as they passed through the barbacan, announced what a Every one started up, and turned their eyes load was taken off her mind when she found herself within the walls of her uncle's woods below?—By the Lord! there is another

'You have dwelt so long in cities, dear Alice,' said the Lord of Hannut, laughing, 'that the forest is a strange world to you, and your imagination peoples it with creatures of its own ;-I shall write to your father, my good Lord of Imbercourt, to say, that he must leave you many a month with me yet, till we have cured you of seeing these wild men of the woods.

'Nay, uncle,' replied the young lady, who had by this time recovered her playful spirits, and looking up in his face as she spoke, with a smile of arch meaning; 'If I were to be terrified with imaginary things, I can tell you I should not have come at all; for my maids have got many a goodly story of the castle of Hannut and its forest—ay, and its lord to boot; and in the morning after our arrival I found that they had all burnt shoes and twisted necks, with sitting the whole of the night before, with their feet in the fire and their heads turned over their shoulders.

The Lord of Hannut heard her with a melancholy smile. 'And hadst thou no fear thyself, my fair Alice?' he demanded: 'did thy imagination never fill the dark end of the he sprang down the steps into the court-yard, chambers with spirits and hobgoblins?'

'Nay, nay, in truth, not I!' replied the young lady; 'such things have no terrors for me! but, when I saw three armed men looking down upon us in the forest, and thought lead them down to the valley below, when that there might be thirty more behind, there the warder gave notice, that the party of Burwas some cause for terror.

The Lord of Hannut and Hugh de Mortmar,-in whom the reader has, doubtless, by this time discovered that Hugh of Gueldres, who, twenty years before, was found sleeping by the cascade, -looked at each other with a meaning smile, but replied nothing; and indeed the conversation was here brought to a conclusion by a variety of unwonted sounds which now suddenly rose up from the forest below. Seldom was it, in truth, that those wild woods rang with the clang of charging horse, and echoed to the blast of the trumpets; but such was the case in the present instance: and as the sounds came borne upon the wind through the open windows, the brow of the Lord of Hannut darkened, and his eye flashed, while if with anger.

'By the Lord! our fair Alice is right, it would seem!' cried Hugh de Mortmar; 'there are more men in the wood than we What, ho! warder!' he exthought for. claimed, leaning from the narrow window and shouting to some one stationed in the gallery of a tall slender tower, which, more else, rose, towering above all the others on ho! warder! what seest thou down in the beyond the grate of the barbacan, and stood blast,' he added, as the trumpets again echoed, clanging through the woods.

The next moment the loud voice of the warder was heard in reply,- 'I see a plump of spears under the arms of Burgundy, running down a handful of the green riders,-but they have not caught them yet. They come closer-they come closer,' he added; 'but the riders make face-they turn again, and spur on-the men at arms are thrown out; but I can see no more, my Lord; they have all got beneath the haggard hill.

'Sound the ban-cloche, ho!' exclaimed the young cavalier: 'arm, and saddle! arm, and sadle, below there!' he continued, shouting to some of the groups who were assembled in the court-yard. 'I would fain see who it is,' he added, turning to the Lord of Hannut, 'who dares to hunt down any men in these woods, your free domain, without your good leave, my Lord.'

'Beware, Hugh, beware!' said the Lord of Hannut, holding up his hand with a warning gesture.

'I will, I will, indeed, my Lord,' he replied; 'I will be most cautious.' So saying, and, while the great bell or ban-cloche rang out its warning peal over hill and dale, he gave rapid orders for arming a small body of men; and was springing on his own horse to gundians he had before seen, together with a considerable body of strangers, were winding up the steep road that led directly to the

Hugh de Mortmar paused; and the instant after, a trumpet was blown at the barbacan, by a squire sent forward by the party to announce the immediate approach of the noble Lord of Imbercourt to the dwelling of his good brother-in-law of Hannut.

The gates of the castle were immediately thrown open; the armed retainers of its lord were drawn up to receive his honoured guest; and Alice ran down to meet her father, whose unexpected coming seemed a gratifying event to all. Hugh de Mortmar, however, lingered behind, and conversed for a few moments in the cheek of the younger cavalier flushed as a low and hurried tone with the Lord of Hannut; and the only words which were heard,-' It is strange that he should have done so in your domains, my Lord-a man so careful in his conduct as he is in general—they surely would never dare to attack him,'-seemed to show that they spoke of the event which had just taken place in the forest. While thus conversing they overtook Alice of Imbercourt, like some Moorish minaret than anything whose impatience had hurried her forward; and then dropping the subject on which they the opposite side of the court-yard. 'What, were speaking, they advanced with her even castle.

came evident, as it did so, that it consisted of govern your indignation as much as may be. two distinct bodies: the one being but partihaps, of a hundred men, independent of a features, and a look of that bold assurance —some perfectly unburdened, and some from conscious rectitude of action or design. loaded with large quantities of armour tied. He was armed at all points except the head, loaded with large quantities of armour ded file was armed at all points except the lead, together confusedly with ropes and chains which was covered alone by its short curly and so disposed as not to be burdensome to grizzled hair; and his basnet hung beside his the horse. The other party seemed to have axe at his saddle-bow. Such was the appearno baggage of any kind; and the arms of all ance now borne by Maillotin du Bac, the sorts which they employed they bore about famous Prévôt Maréchal of Burgundy, who, their own persons.

the slope, glancing in and out of the scattered Charles of Burgundy to root out the bands wood, which, now tinted with all the thousand by which the country was infested - probably shades of the declining sun, clothed the ascent, on the faith of the old adage, which recomand cast long marking shadows across the mends us to set a thief to catch a thief, winding road of yellow sand. Now, the 'You are my Lord of Hannut, fair si horsemen passing through the depths of the sume, said the Prévôt, dismounting, and wood could scarcely be distinguished from the speaking in that coarse, sharp, jarring tone of trees amidst which they advanced; now, emerging from the overhanging boughs, they mass of horses and riders; but, as soon as stout a soldier as he is a worthy counsellor—they came nearer, the form of each individual has but now prayed, or rather commanded,— and watched their approach.

handsome, middle-aged man, with a counten- Hannut. ance which was grave, without being austere. When within a few yards of the top of the within the precincts of the wood itself, am, it with a quick step towards the party assembled years I have heard of no outrage whatsoever to meet him. Yielding first to natural affec- committed within the bounds of my domain. and, as he held their hands in each of his, he territory within my jurisdiction of such gentry said, in a low and hurried tone intended to as you mention; nor shall I certainly suffer meet their ear, and their ear alone, before the any one else to interfere with my rights, rest of the party came up,—'I beseech you, my good brother, and you, my dear Hughwhom one day I shall call my son-whatever 'I will easily furnish you with proof that your you may hear presently, bridle your anger. forest is tenanted as I say. Did we not, Your rights have been somewhat violated by within this half hour, encounter a whole party. the leader of that band behind; but I have of as undoubted brigands as ever lived?

on the edge of the hill, looking down upon prevailed upon him to desist; and both be-the large party that approached, as it wound cause he is a high officer of our sovereign slowly up the steep ascent which led to the Lord the Duke, and because these times are too threatening from abroad to admit of feuds The cavalcade soon came near; and it be- between subjects at home, I beseech ye to

The followers of Impercourt had halted as ally armed, and riding under the banner of soon as they reached the level ground or terthe Lord of Imbercourt; the other being race in face of the barbacan; and the leader of clothed in steel from head to heel, and bear- the second band had by this time gained the ing conspicuous the cognizance of the house brow of the hill, and now rode quickly up to of Burgundy. The first band, however, was the party at the gate. He was a tall, gaunt, the most numerous, and might consist, perbony man, of about forty, with keen eagle's number of grooms, horse-boys, and varlets, as which proceeds more from animal courage, they were called, leading several spare horses and a mind continually upon its guard, than having been himself one of the greatest plun-Thus accoutred, both bodies wound on up derers of the time, had been appointed by

'You are my Lord of Hannut, fair sir I prevoice which is only fit for a hangman.

The Lord of Hannut answered by a stately stood out clear upon the evening sky, as their bow, and the other proceeded: 'My good path skirted along the edge of the cliff. At Lord of Imbercourt, here, whom I reverence first all appeared indistinct—one confused and respect, as in duty bound—he being as horseman became defined; and gradually for he having taken the responsibility upon their features, as they were their helmets up, himself, I have yielded of course to his injunctould be distinguished by those who stood tions,—has commanded me to desist from pursuing the brigands and plunderers, who, for At the head of the first party rode a tall, many years past have haunted this forest of

'Sir,' replied the Lord of Hannut, 'I, living hill, he threw his horse's rein to a squire, and, appears, sadly ignorant of what goes on be-springing lightly to the ground, advanced neath its shade; for during nearly twenty tion, he cast his arms round his daughter, Had I done so-had any tale of robbery or Alice of Imbercourt; and passed her to his pillage met my ears—I, as supreme lord, bosom. He then saluted frankly and kindly holding a right of exercising justice both high the Lord of Hannut and Hugh de Mortmar; and low, would not have failed to clear the within my own lands.

'My Lord, my Lord !' replied the Prevot :

est, Sir Prevot, was well enough seen from horse, which was rendered difficult by his the belfry of the castle, rejoined Hugh de arms being tightly pinioned behind. Mortmar, with a frowning brow; 'but whether they were not as honest or honester persons de Mortmar; 'I never saw a nobler countethan yourself, remains to be proved, and shall nance. By his dress, too, he seems a burgher be enquired into most strictly. At all events, sir you have infringed upon the rights of my uncle, which must be enquired into also.—Well, well, my dear Lord, he added, noticing a sign by which the Lord of Hannut However, he was not taken on these terri-required him to be silent; well, well, I say tories, and therefore, my good lord, his capno more, than that these thief-catchers grow ture can be no offence to you. For courtesy's too insolent.'

The brow of Maillotin du Bac bent, his eyebrows almost met, and his left hand played state prisoner, and must be guarded careominously with the hilt of his dagger, as he fully. muttered, - 'Thief-takers!' But farther discussion was cut short by the Lord of Hannut, Hannut; 'thank God, all my dungeons are who exclaimed, - 'Peace Hugh! peace! we clear at present, and far be it from me to opmust not show scanty hospitality to any one. pose the due exercise of your office, in the Sir Maillotin du Bac, we will speak farther with you hereafter, on the subjects that you mention; and if you can prove to us that any you,' replied the Prévôt. 'Where shall we outrage of any kind has been committed within the limits of my domain, both my shall exercise within my lordship, the rights which belong alone to me,

'Outrage, sir'! rejoined the Prévôt; 'did not the men who burnt the house of the Lord of Harghen take refuge in your forests within this month?

pressor of the poor, the plunderer of the spirits up, I pray you.' widow and the orphan, was no very evil deed in my eyes. However, let us not bandy words here at the gate; we will speak farther this evening.

The whole party now passed through the barbacan, and the Lord of Hannut gave special order to his seneschal to attend to the comfort of the soldiers, while he himself led his brotherin-law, the Lord of Imbercourt, and a few of that nobleman's most distinguished attendants, towards the great hall of the castle.

Maillotin du Bac followed boldly, as one of the chief guests; and finding that no great courtesy was shown him in marshalling the way, he exclaimed, in a loud and intrusive

'My lord! my lord! before we leave our men, I must crave that you would yield me the use of a dungeon.

'For your own abode, sir?' demanded Hugh de Mortmar, with not the most gracious smile in the world.

No, no, replied the Prévôt, but for you prisoner there; and he pointed to a part of the court-yard, where two of his followers were aiding a young man of a powerful frame

That you attacked some persons in the for- and striking appearance to dismount from his

'That can be no thief, surely,' said Hugh of the first order.

'The gown does not make the monk,' replied Maillotin du Bac, with a grim smile. If he be no thief, he may be somewhat worse. sake, and for the Prince's service, I claim the use of a dungeon for this night. He is a

Be it so, Sir Prévôt,' replied the Lord of Duke's service.'

'Said like a worthy lord, as I always held bestow him?'

Roger de Lorens,' said the Lord of Hannephew and myself will do our best to punish nut, turning to his seneschal, 'show this the offenders. But neither Duke nor King worthy gentleman, the Prévôt of our lord the Duke, the different prison-rooms beneath the square tower; let him choose which he will, as most secure; and when he has made his choice, give him up the key thereof. Be the prisoner under your own charge, Sir Maillotin du Bac, he added; 'yet, for the honour of Whether they did or not, I cannot say,' remy dwelling I trust that you will let his treat-plied the Lord of Hannut; 'but their burning ment be as gentle as may be. Let him have the house of that audacious villain, the op- wine and other refreshments to keep his

> 'Black bread and foul water would be good enough for him,' replied Maillotin du Bac; 'but at your request, my lord, he shall have better fare. Sir Seneschal, I follow you; lead the way. Ho! Martin du Garch, bring along the prisoner.

Thus saying, the Prévôt of the Duke of Burgundy,-who, though a knight and a man of good family, had once, as we have before noticed, been a notorious adventurer, and had now become the great persecutor of his former comrades, -followed the seneschal of Hannut across the court-yard, towards the passage which led to the dungeons. In the mean while, the Lord of Hannut, with Hugh de Mortmar, and the Lord of Imbercourt, with his daughter Alice, advanced to the great hall, where preparations were already in course for serving the evening meal,

CHAPTER VIII.

AN UNFORTUNATE PRISONER.

WHILE the Prévôt of Burgundy had remained within ear-shot Imbercourt had maintained a profound silence, or, speaking in a low familiar tone to his daughter, had appeared perfectly inattentive to what was going on beside him. No sooner, however, had they passed on through the great hall and up a flight of steps, into a large sort of withdrawing room, in which it was the custom of the guests in those days to wash their hands before dinner, than he closed the door with his own hand, and earnestly thanked the two noble gentlemen by whom he was accompanied for their forbearance on the present occasion.

'I have much, much to tell you, my noble brother-in-law,' he said; 'and much on which to ask your advice. Much have I also to tell you, Hugh,' he added, laying his hand on the arm of the younger of the two noblemen; 'but I must do it in as few words as possible, before we are joined by that un-worthy man, whom we must not offend, though he be part spy, part hangman, part Hugh, 'that you do not interfere to set him cut-throat. In the first place, in your solitude at liberty?' here, you scarcely know the state either of the ders; both of which are unhappily in so precarious a situation, that it will need infinite moderation, prudence, and skill, on the part of all true lovers of their country, to keep us from events too fearful to con-template. Throughout the whole of Duke Charles's dominions, the nobles are turbulent and discontented; the citizens rebellious and insolent; and, to crown all, the Duke himself, never very temperate in his conduct, since the defeat of Granson seems to have given uncommon prudence away as a burdensome incumbrance.'

four hundred Swiss, which he found in a yourself: and, from your conduct both in town in Lorraine,—a most barbarous and in-Spain and Italy, I fear not but human act, which, if he commit many such, will make all good men abandon him.

outrages.'

rupted the Lord of Hannut. 'If there be any he spoke he raised that of Alice, who had truth in the starry influences, he has met with been listening, with her deep blue eyes full of some deep misfortune already, and will meet anxious attention—'and it has only been from with greater still ere long. When heard you the hope that this fair hand would form a from the Duke? he added, seeing a doubtful bond, which, uniting the fate of Imbercourt smile curl the lip of his brother-in-law, as he and Gueldres together, would render them too referred to an art in which Imbercourt placed strong for tyranny to resist, that I have reless faith than most of his contemporaries.

old,' replied Imbercourt; 'the Duke was my sword, while the oppressor is embarrassed

then marching rapidly towards the mounttains. But it was not of his intemperance to-wards the Swiss I was about to speak, though his conduct to them has been cruel enough. Still they were enemies; but he seems resolved to drive the men of Ghent into revolt also; and he has commanded his prévôt to arrest any one, whether merchant, mechanic, or noble, who attempts to pass the frontier from Ghent into France. prisoner, that you saw but now, is the firstfruit of this precious order; that meddling fool, Du Bac, who, like the tiger, loves blood for blood's sake, takes care to fulfil every intemperate order of the Duke to the very uttermost, especially against the Gandois, towards whom he and some other of his fellows have a most deadly hatred. I can hear of no precise offence which the prisoner has committed, though his captor has shown me some letters found upon him, which he would fain construe into treason; and if they urge the matter farther against him, they will drive the men of Ghent mad outright. Why, one half of their trade is with France!'

'How is it then, my lord,' demanded

'I dare not for my head,' replied Imberduchy of Burgundy, or of the county of Flan- court. Besides, I am not here in the capacity of counsellor: I am now, by the Duke's order, marching to join him with the small force that you see, -all, indeed, that I have been able to raise. But to the object of my coming! Hugh, the Duke needs men. and calls angrily on all his vassals to take the field. Often and earnestly have I entreated for clemency towards your father, and my entreaties have been in vain. One good stroke in the field, however, done by your hand, were worth more than all the eloquence that bridled rein to his fury, and to have cast all the tongue of man could ever boast. Gather together what forces you can, and follow me to the camp, under the name that you have at 'We have heard, indeed,' said the Lord of present assumed. I will take care that you Hannut, 'of his having hanged a garrison of shall have the opportunity of distinguishing

'It is in vain, my lord, it is in vain,' replied Hugh de Mortmar. 'Never will I draw my 'Too true, indeed,' replied Imbercourt; sword for a man who holds my father a close 'but I fear this is but a prelude to greater prisoner: surely it is enough not to draw my sword against him; and it has only been 'Ay, and to greater misfortunes,' inter- from the hope that this fair hand -, and as frained, during the last year, from attempting 'Our last news is more than a fortnight to open the gates of my father's prison with upon his head.

'I cannot blame your feelings, Hugh,' reserious causes of offence which have induced severity; but do you at the same time modeneed say no more.'

He spoke with grave and impressive earnestness, and seemed about to proceed to some other part of the subject, when the heavy clanging step of Maillotin du Bac, as he walked nonchalantly up the stairs, from the great hall, into the withdrawing room, picious ear was nigh, and he merely added,

We will speak more to-night.

The Prévôt entered the room with a look of great satisfaction, slipping at the same time the handle of an enormous key over the thong of his sword-belt, which he again buckled over his shoulder; so that the key, dropping down till it struck against his sword, hung by the side of the more chivalrous weapon, offering no bad type of the character of the wearer.

'Admirable dungeons these, my good lord the moment no one understood what he of Hannut,' he reiterated as he entered,— 'Admirable dungeons, admirable dungeons 'Offence, indeed!' exclaimed Maillotin du indeed!—Your own construction, I doubt not, and a good construction it is. I defy the nimblest cut-purse in the empire to make his way thence, while this key hangs at my side. The window, indeed, the window is a little too wide; what the devil the rogues want windows for at all I don't understand,—but it is just a thought too wide. I have known a fat young rogue so starve himself down in a week's time, that he would get through a hole

'Pray, what is the poor youth's offence?' demanded the lord of Hannut; but as the other was about to reply, the pages and varlets-as the inferior servants were called in that day-brought in basins, ewers, and napkins, for the guests to wash, while the trumpets sounded loud without; and, in a few moments afterwards, the whole party were seated at their evening meal.

As must always be the case in such meetings,—when the ingredients of the assembly are discrepant in themselves, notwithstanding the fortuitous circumstances which may for the time have brought them together—the 'Ha, ha! my lord,' replied the Prévôt, conversation was broken and interrupted, with a grin, 'not so great a fool as that Sometimes the loud swell of many voices either! Had I not thought to make more of

with wars and misfortunes that his own din. Sometimes one or two protracted the grasping and cruel disposition have brought conversation in a lower tone, after the others had ceased; 'but still, every subject that was started, dropped after a few minutes' discusplied the lord of Imbercourt, 'nor will I sion, and the parties betook themselves again hurt you by pointing out the somewhat to demolishing the huge piles of meat that, according to the custom of those times, were the Duke to treat your father with so great set before them. Wine was in plenty, but all drank sparingly, except the Prévôt, and one rate your angry terms, and remember that or two of the officers who followed the lord Charles of Burgundy is my sovereign lord, of Imbercourt. For his part, Maillotin du my benefactor, and my friend. I think I Bac seemed determined that, as far as the equality of his favours went, no jealousy should exist between the trencher and the pottle-pot. His food swam down his throat in Burgundy, and the consequences were such as are usual with men of strong constitutions and well-seasoned brains. He lost not in the least degree the use of his senses; but his warned the lord of Imbercourt that a sus- tongue, on which he was never wont to impose any very strict restraint, obtained an additional degree of liberty after the fifth or sixth cup he had quaffed; and, perceiving the lord of Hannut speaking for a few moments in a low tone to his brother-in-law, he concluded at once that their conversation must refer to his prisoner; and, resuming the subject without farther ceremony, he replied to the question his entertainer had put to him before dinner-so abruptly, indeed, that for

Bac—' offence enough, I trow; why now, I'll tell you how it was. We had just come out of Namur, where we had supped, — not quite so well as we have here, it's true; no matter for that, we had wine enough—and we were quartering ourselves in a little village down below, when one of my fellows, as stout a hand as ever was born, got saying something civil to the wife of a draper, just at the door of her shop. What more I don't know, but the that would not have passed his thigh when foolish cullion took it into her head to squeak first he was taken. No fear of yon fellow below, however; it would require a precious in the dungeon, and at one blow fells my hole to pass his chest and shoulders.

fellow, Stephen, to the ground, with a broken jaw. What the devil business had he with it? If he had been an old lover of hers, well enough; but he confesses that he never saw her before till that moment, and must come up and meddle, because she chose to squeal like a caught hare.'

Hugh de Mortmar turned his eyes upon the lord of Imbercourt, who bit his lip, and observed gravely,—'Were this all the young man's offence, Sir Prévôt, it would behove us to consider the matter better before we give way to your hankering for dungeons and cords.

made, for a minute or two, an unspeakable the good youth, I would have split his skull

ment taking place in chaudemelée, as the laws of St. Louis have it, we should have heard nothing more of the matter: but I knew the gallant well by sight,—one who affects popularity amongst the turbulent folk of Ghent; and having orders to arrest all who attempted to cross the frontier into France, I laid hold of him forthwith, examined his papers, and found sufficient, with a little good management, to give him a cool dangle by the neck in the fresh air of some fine September morning. But what need I say more? You yourself have seen the letters.

'Meddling fool!' muttered Imbercourt to subjects into revolt at home, while he is assailed by enemies abroad.' This speech, how-in the forest of Hannut.

A few words passed, in an under tone, between Hugh de Mortmar and the Lord of leading the way to the battlements, entered Hannut; and at length the old noble proceeded to discuss with the Prévôt of the Duke sation with Imbercourt and Hugh de Mortof Burgundy the infraction of his rights which mar, as we shall continue to call the son of had been committed by that officer in the the imprisoned Duke of Gueldres.

morning. The Prévôt, however, sturdily with all his eloquence, however, Imbermaintained his ground, declaring that he him-court failed to persuade the young cavalier self and all his band, consisting of about forty persons, had encountered and pursued a considerable body of men, whose appearance and demeanour left not the slightest doubt in regard to their general trade and occupation. Going farther still, he appealed to the Lord of Imbercourt himself, who had come up while the freebooters were still in sight, and particular.

'Well, sir,' replied the Lord of Hannut, tenance of the law within my own territories I have always hitherto attended to myselfand that so strictly that for twenty years I have an especial police of your own,—a sort watch and ward than mortal eyes can do. Nevertheless, I must not neglect my duty while I am in the body; and in doing it I fear neither man nor spirit.'

my own domain---'

'I know not to what you are pleased to allude, sir, replied the lord of Hannut, frowning: 'nevertheless I may find means to punish those who are insolent. However, as he spoke he bent down his eyes, and pondered you say that you have seen evil-disposed per- for several minutes on the difficult situation sons in the forest, and my lord of Imbercourt in which he was placed. here confirms your statement, I will willing by where he stood, with my axe; and his punish- grant you permission for one day to scour the whole of my domain from side to side; and, if you find any one strong enough to make head against you, my own vassals shall be summoned to give you aid. After that day, however, you must withdraw your troop, and retire, nor ever again presume to set foot within my bounds without my permission.

'One day, my Lord,' replied the Prévôt,

' will be hardly-

'I shall grant no more, sir,' said the Lord of Hannut, rising from the table, in which example he was followed by several of his guests; 'I shall grant no more, sir; and the concession which I make proceeds solely from himself; 'he will contrive to drive the Duke's a feeling of respect for my good Lord the Duke of Burgundy. Though I rise, 'he added, addressing all the party from a general feelever, passed no farther than the ears of the ing of courtesy, 'though I rise, do not hold two persons next to him. And the conversa- it, gentlemen, as a signal to break off your tion soon turned to the bands of freebooters revelry. Spare not the flagon, I beseech you; it, gentlemen, as a signal to break off your which, the Prévôt stoutly asserted, harboured and here are comfits and spices to give zest to your wine.

Thus saying, he retired from the hall; and, into a long and, to them, interesting conver-

to join the armies of the Duke of Burgundy. To every argument he replied that men fought for their friends, not their enemies; and such he should ever hold Charles of Burgundy to be, till Adolphus of Gueldres was set at liberty. All that could be obtained of him was a promise not to attempt his father's liberation by arms, till one more effort had been who actually did confirm his account in every made to persuade Charles the Bold to grant his freedom upon other terms.

'Consider well, Hugh, the peculiar situa-'since such is the case, far be it from me to tion in which you stand,' said the Lord of impede the execution of justice. The main- Imbercourt; 'the secret of your birth rests with myself and my good brother here alone; but did the Duke know that the son of Adolphus of Gueldres is still living, the imprisonhave heard of no outrage within the limits of ment of your father would, in all probability, become more severe, and your own personal 'Why, as to that, my lord,' interrupted safety might be very doubtful. An ineffectual the Prévôt, grinning, 'we do hear that you attempt to liberate your father must instantly divulge all; nor could I-though I have proof airy archers of the guard, who keep better mised you my Alice, in case we can obtain by peaceful means that which we so much desire-nor could I, as a faithful servant of the house of Burgundy, give you my daughter's hand, if you were once actually in arms against the lord I serve.'

'It is a hard alternative,' said Hugh de Mortmar-'it is a hard alternative;' and as

His heart, however, was full of the buoyant

and rejoicing spirit of youth; and the cares chamber, and the little sunshine that ever have been. Such ideas led him to think over, was listened to by the auditory, that two of and to pity, the situation of the unhappy the Lord of Imbercourt's officers, who were prisoner; and quitting the subject of his own playing at tables under the light of the lamp; affairs, he demanded of the Lord of Imber- and several others, who had been amusing court, whether he, as a counsellor of the themselves at a little distance with the very Duke, could not take upon himself to set the ancient and interesting game of 'pitch and unfortunate burgher at liberty.

Du Bac found upon his person: they consist lected, the greater part of his companions, of little more than the murmurs and com- feeling themselves in a dwelling whose visitors plaints of discontented citizens, such as are to were very generally reported to be more frebe met with in all countries and in all times; quently of a spiritual than a corporeal nature, and which, at any other period, would attract got up simultaneously, and agreed to accomno attention whatever. At present, however, pany him on his expedition. with discontent and turbulence spreading over will probably set the city of Ghent into open holding the inside of the dungeon in which revolt, and might light a flame in the land the unhappy burgher was confined. Maillotin which would require oceans of blood to extin- du Bac satisfied himself of his presence, by guish. Nevertheless I dare not interfere.

Hugh de Mortmar made no reply, but mused for a few moments in silence; and then, with a gay, light laugh, and a jest about then setting down a pitcher of wine which he some other matter, he left his two elder com- had brought with him, the Prévôt closed the panions, and proceeded to seek his fair Alice door again without a word. The only further through all the long, rambling chambers, and ceremony was slipping the key over his swordretired and quiet bowers, so favourable for belt, from which he had detached it to open whispered words and unmarked meetings, the door; and the whole party, once more rewith which every castle of that day was most turning to upper air, separated for the night, conveniently furnished.

Maillotin du Bac, in the meanwhile, continued sturdily to bear up under the repeated attacks of Burgundy upon his brain. Draught after draught he swallowed, in company with some of the old and seasoned soldiers, who were no way loth to join him; but at length the sun went down, night fell, the cresset was lighted in the large hall; and, unwillingly LEAVING the brutal officer and his compan-

that ploughed it one minute, only caused it to found its way in, either by the high window bring forth a harvest of fresh hopes the next. or the far door, rendered not unpleasant even Hard as was his fate in some respects, when on a summer's evening. A number of others he compared it with that of the young man gathered round; and the wine having prowho now tenanted one of the dungeons of duced sufficient effect to render them all rather that very castle, -a comparison to which his more imaginative than usual, the stories of mind was naturally called,—he felt no grati- hunting and freebooters, with which the evenfication, indeed, as some would argue, at the ing commonly began, in such a castle, soon evils of his fellow-creature's lot; but he felt deviated into many a tale of superstition. that there was much to be grateful for in his Every one had something wonderful to relate; own. Hope, and liberty, and love, were all and such, indeed, was the unction with which before him; and his expectations rose high, many a history of ghost, and spirit, and as he thought how much worse his fate might demon was told by several of the party, and toss; abandoned those occupations, to share 'I would well-nigh give my right hand to more fully in the legends which were going on replied Imbercourt, 'not alone for the round the fire. Each individual helped his sake of simple justice to an individual, but for neighbour on upon the road of credulity and the sake of the peace and tranquillity of the superstition; and when, at length, Maillotin whole state; but I must not do it, my young du Bac rose, from a sense of duty, to visit his friend. I have seen the letters which this prisoner, an attention which he never neg-

Lighted by a torch they wound down some the whole land; with courtiers, who find it of the narrow, tortuous staircases of the their interest to urge the Duke on to acts of building; and pausing opposite a door, the insane violence; and with a prince, whose massive strength and thickness of which the temper and power are equally uncontrollable; Prévôt did not fail to make his comrades rethose papers may cost the young man's life, mark, they were soon gratified farther by bethrusting the torch rudely towards his face as he half sat, half reclined on a pile of straw which had been spread out for his bed; and and retired to rest.

CHAPTER IX.

THE VERT GALLANT OF HANNUT.

giving up his cup, he suffered the board to be ions to sleep off the fumes of the wine they removed, and east himself down on a seat be- had imbibed, we must return to the dungeon side the fire, which the vast extent of the where, in darkness and in gloom, sat Albert Maurice, the young burgher of Ghent; whom, his own fate, and aggravate its circumstances, perhaps, the reader may have already recog- without proving at all beneficial to his nised in the prisoner of Maillotin du Bac.

The silent agony of impotent indignation preyed upon his heart more painfully even of the indignation which his death would than the dark and fearful anticipations of the cause, wakening the people of his native future, which every circumstance of his situa- place to such great, generous, and welltion naturally presented to his mind. Wronged, directed exertions, as would permanently esoppressed, trampled on; insulted by base tablish the liberties of the land, there was in and ungenerous men, whose minds were as his own bosom that mixture of pride, enthuinferior to his own as their power was superior; siasm, and patriotism, which would have the events which he knew must follow.

tyranny could stigmatise as even seditious. He had visited Namur with no idea of entering France-a country, on which the Duke of ration of soul and body. On the contrary, ing the mercantile business which his uncle's lating upon his head indignities and wrongs were at that time equally disaffected; and to issue to the gibbet or the block, amongst the papers with which he had thus also-the fact of having protected a woman straw, which was the only bed that his gaoler insulted by one of the ruffianly soldiers of the had afforded him. Prévôt's, band, and of having punished the offender on the spot-he knew well might, to (legitimate authority, and be brought to contents.

country.

Had he, indeed seen the slightest prospect he cared less for the death that in all proba- carried him to the scaffold with a feeling of bility awaited him, than for the degradation triumph rather than degradation. But when he already suffered, and for the present and his eye wandered over all those he knew in future oppression of his country, his order, Ghent, -nay, in all Flanders, -and sought to and his fellow-creatures, to which his hopes find a man fitted by nature and by circumcould anticipate no end, and for which his stances to lead and to direct the struggles of mind could devise no remedy. Whatever ex- the middle and lower classes against the pectation Fancy might sometimes, in her tyranny that then oppressed the land, he wildest dreams, have suggested to his hopes could find none, in whose character and of becoming the liberator of his native land, situation there were not disadvantages which and the general benefactor of mankind- would frustrate his endeavours, or render dreams which he had certainly entertained, them more disadvantageous than beneficial to though he had never acted upon-they were the country. His own death he saw, he felt, all extinguished for ever by his arrest, and would extinguish the last hope of the liberty of Flanders, at least for the time; and neither The arrest had taken place, indeed, while zeal nor passion could offer anything, gaengaged in no pursuit which the most jealous thered from the prospect before him, to counterbalance, even in the slightest degree, the natural antipathy of man to the awful sepa-Burgundy looked with the most suspicious every accessory particular of his fate was caleyes-but simply for the purpose of transact- culated to aggravate his distress, by accumuhouse carried on with various traders of that He was to be dragged into his native town Unfortunately, however, on his return amongst grooms and horseboys, bound with towards Ghent, he had charged himself with cords like a common thief, paraded through several letters from different citizens of Namur, the long and crowded streets in mid-day to to persons in his native place. Both cities the common prison, from whence he was alone

Such were the subjects of his contemplation burdened himself, several had proved, under -such were the images that thronged before the unceremonious inspection of Maillotin du his mind's eye, as, with a burning heart and Bac, to be of a nature which might, by a aching brow, and with a lip that seemed as little perversion, be construed into treason. if some evil angel had breathed upon it all the The immediate cause of his first detention fire of his own, he lay stretched upon the

The dungeon was all in darkness; for, either from carelessness or design, no light by the aid of a little false swearing, a thing had been left with him. But could his face almost as common in those days as at present, have been seen, notwithstanding the agonisbe made to take the semblance of resistance ing thoughts that thrilled through his bosom, none of those wild contortions would there have prove his connection with the letters, of which been traced, which affect weaker beings under he was simply the bearer, unconscious of their the like pangs. His hand was pressed some. times firmly upon his brow, as if to hold the Under such circumstances nothing was to throbbing veins from bursting outright; and be expected but an ignominious death; no sometimes he bit his under lip unconsciously, remedy was to be found, no refuge presented or shut his teeth hard, striving to prevent the Though his fellow-citizens of Ghent despair which mastered his heart from anmight revolt-though his friends and relations nouncing its dominion by a groan. His eye might murmur and complain-revolt and might have been seen full of keen anguish, complaint, he well knew, would only hurry and the bright red flushing of his cheek might have told how strongly the body sym- nobleman had declared that all the dungeons pathised with the pangs of the mind; but of the castle were untenanted.

Thus hour passed after hour-for the wings of time, as they fly through the night of despair, are as rapid as when they cut the midday sky of joy-Thus hour passed after hour, from the time that the brutal Prévôt closed the door of the dungeon; and the prisoner terval that seemed but of a few minutes.

come from that side of the dungeon.

from the rock on which the castle stood, partly seemed to proceed. formed by the solid foundations of the buildof about twelve inches in diameter, passed up- and grew more and more intense. At length, a portico.

it was all an effort to repress what was pass- noise continued, becoming more and more ing within, not the weakness of yielding to it. distinct every moment; and, as leaning on He lay quite still, without one voluntary his arm upon his couch of straw, he gazed movement-he suffered not his limbs to writhe earnestly upon the vacant space on the other he tossed not to and fro, in the restlessness side of the vault, a single, bright ray of of agony-but remained quiet if not tranquil, light burst suddenly forth upon the darkness, though full of deep, bitter, burning, voiceless and, streaming across the open space, painted a long perpendicular pencil of yellow brightness upon the wall close beside him.

Albert Maurice started upon his feet: and perceived, to his surprise, the ray he beheld issued, beyond all doubt, from the body of the pillar itself. The reputed commune of the Lord of Hannut with the beings of another could scarcely believe that the castle clock world, his dark and mysterious studies, and was right, when eleven - mid-night - one the extraordinary fulfilment that many of his o'clock, chimed rapidly one after another, astrological predictions were reported to have each leaving between itself and the last an in- met with, had often reached the ear of Albert Maurice; but his mind was too enlightened to The single stroke upon the bell-that, echo- be credulous, at least, to that extent to which ing through the long, solitary, and now silent credulity was generally carried in that age. passages and courts of the castle, passed un- All the fearful circumstances, too, of his new heeded by the sleeping guests, and only told situation had hitherto blotted out from his to the watchful warder, or the sentry, that mind the rumours he had heard; and when he the first hour of a new day was gone, -had had entered the castle of Hannut he looked scarcely sounded upon the ear of Albert upon it merely as a place of temporary confine-Maurice when a new noise called his atten- ment, from which he was to be led to ignominy tion. It was a harsh, heavy grating sound, as and death. Now, however, when he beheld of some weighty body pushed slowly over a with his own eyes a beam of light, doubly rough surface; and it appeared so near that bright from the darkness around, breaking his eye was immediately turned towards the forth from the face of the solid masonry, withdoor of the dungeon, expecting to see it open. out any obvious cause or means, all that he had It moved not, however: the sound still went heard rose up before his memory, and without on; and he now perceived that it did not absolutely giving credit to the different tales which he thus remembered, he was certainly The apartment itself was a low roofed, startled and surprised; and held his breath, massive chamber, just below the surface of with a feeling of awe and expectation, as he the earth; and seemed to be partly excavated gazed on the spot whence that mysterious ray

At the same time, the sound continued, and One single window, or spiracle. gradually, as it went on, the light expanded wards through the thick masonry, to the ex- it became evident, that a part of the massy ternal air beyond: and one of those short, column, about two feet from the ground, was massive pillars-which we sometimes see in opening in a perpendicular direction, slowly the crypts of very ancient churches—stand- but steadily; and that the light issued from ing in the centre, supported the roof, and ap- the aperture left by the rolling back, on either parently the basement of the castle itself; side, of two of the large stones which appeared under the tremendous weight of which, a to form the shaft. For the first few minutes fanciful eye might have conceived it to be the vacancy did not extend to a hand's breadth crushed down; so broad and clumsy were in wideness, though to about three feet in the proportions of the column, in comparison height, and nothing could be seen beyond, but with the rudest Tuscan shaft that ever upheld the light pouring forth from within. A minute more, however, so much increased the aper-From behind this pillar, the sounds that ture, that Albert Maurice could perceive a he heard appeared to proceed; and he might gauntleted hand, and an arm clothed in steel, have imagined that some human being, con-turning slowly round in the inside-apparently fined in a neighbouring chamber, sought to by the full exertion of its strength-what communicate with him through the walls, had seemed to be the winch of a wheel. The form, it not happened that he had caught the words to which this hand and arm belonged, was for of the lord of Hannut in the morning; when, some time concealed behind the stone; but, in speaking with Maillotin du Pac, that as the opening became larger, the blocks ap-eyes of the prisoner a narrow staircase in the me! heart of the pillar, with the head, arms, and chest of a powerful man, covered with armour. appearing in the aperture which their removal had left.

Beside him stood a complicated piece of machinery; by the agency of which, two of the largest ones, forming the shaft of the pillar, were made to revolve upon the pivots of iron' that connected them with the rest of the column; and in a bracket on the stairs was fixed the burning torch, which afforded the execution might be dangerous to the tranquillity of the state.

Totally different, however, in every respect, was the person whom he now beheld; for, under the armour by which he was covered, vet that armour itself was a sufficient proof, at least to Albert Maurice, that the stranger activity and strength.

those of his new visitor.

fancies from the mind of Albert Maurice, nor had just left. for, advancing directly towards him, he gowns, of many kinds, were piled upon a peared to move with greater facility, and at clasped the arm of the prisoner in his gauntlength, rolling back entirely, displayed to the leted hand, saying, in a low voice, 'Follow

> Albert Maurice paused; and gazed upon the stranger-over whose green armour the flashing red light of the torch cast a strange and extraordinary glare-with a glance of doubt and hesitation! but his irresolution was removed at once, by the stranger demanding, in the same clear and distinct, but low tone, 'Can you be worse than you are here?'

'Lead on,' he replied; 'I follow you.'

'Pass through,' said the stranger, pointing with his hand to the aperture in the column. light that now poured into the dungeon.
Albert Maurice stood gazing in no small surprise. The feeling of awe—which, however situation—the inefficacy of resistance, even if near akin to fear, was not fear-that he had anything evil were meditated against himfelt on first perceiving the light, was now suc- the thought, too, that it were better to die, ceeded by other sensations; and, had there murdered in a prison, than to be exposed a been the slightest resemblance between the spectacle to the multitude by public execution, personal appearance of the man who stood be- mingled with a strong hope, that relief was at fore him, and that of Maillotin du Bac, or any hand, though he knew not whence that relief of his band, he would have supposed that the might come-made hin cast away all doubts; purpose of the Prévôt was to dispatch him in and, stepping over the mass of stone, below prison—an event which not unfrequently took the aperture, he found himself in a staircase place, in the case of prisoners whose public only sufficiently large to admit the ascent or descent of one person at a time. The secret entrance, which it afforded to that dungeon, seemed its only object; for, to all appearance, it was carried up no farther through the colthough his form could not well be distinguished umn; the space above being occupied by the machinery for moving the blocks of stone.

'Descend a few steps,' said the stranger, 'that I may close the passage.' And as soon was in no way connected with the band of the as he found himself obeyed, he also entered Prévôt. Every plate of his mail was painted the column; and applying the full strength of a deep, leafy green; and even his helmet, of his powerful arm to the winch which moved which was without crest or plume, and the the machinery, he succeeded, in a few minutes, visor of which was down, was of the same forest colour. In other respects he seemed a tall, aperture of the column, so exactly back into powerful man, formed equally for feats of their places in the masonry, that not even in the inside could it be seen that they did not Little time was allowed the prisoner for form a part of the wall of the staircase. When making further observations: for as soon as this was accomplished, he said, in the same the stones had been rolled back as far as their brief manner in which he had before spoken, construction permitted, the stranger at once 'Go on!' and then followed the prisoner, sprang into the dungeon; though the young holding the torch as far before him as possible, burgher remarked at the same time, that a to let the other see the way as he descended leap which would have made any other arms step by step. After having proceeded for clang, with a noise nearly sufficient to waken about fifteen or twenty yards, Albert Maurice the whole castle, produced no sound from found his further progress opposed by a strong oaken door, but it proved unlocked; The mechanical means which he had used and having pushed it open by the desire of to procure an entrance had, at once, as we his conductor, he stepped forth into a small have before said, banished all superstitious vaulted chamber, not unlike the dungeon he fancies from the mind of Albert Maurice, nor had just left. Various objects, however, did even his noiseless tread recall them. The which, by the light of another torch that was young burgher, however, still looked upon the there burning, he beheld strewed about in man-at-arms with some feelings of doubt, ap-different parts of the room, showed him at prehension, and astonishment; though his once that the purposes to which it was applied own presence in the dungeon was far from were very different from those to which the seeming to surprise this nocturnal visitor; other was appropriated. Several cloaks and bench close to the door; and across them as we shall henceforth term the person who ment; and in the midst was placed a table,

Sitting on a bench at the far end of this table, and on which his head and arms rested, was a man apparently sound asleep. He was armed all but his head, which was covered alone by its own long tangled black hair; but his armour was of a very different kind from that of the stranger who had guided Albert Maurice thither, consisting alone of one of those light suits of body mail, which were called brigandines; and the common use of which, amongst have conferred upon you so great a favour." the lawless soldiers of the day, had acquired for them the name of brigands. The general rice, 'although Heaven only knows whether hue of his whole dress, however, was green, like his companion's, and Albert Maurice was 'Rule yourself by my directions,' replied soon led to conceive, that he was in the hands the other, 'and fear not for the result; but of a party of those bold adventurers, who had first for the oath.' So saying, he unsheathed succeeded the schwarz reiters, or black horse- his sword, and holding up the cross which men, and had obtained, from the general formed the hilt, before the eyes of the young colour of their dress, the title of green riders. burgher, he added, 'Swear by this blessed It is true that the latter had displayed, upon all occasions, a much more generous and noble spirit than their predecessors, whose hope for his aid at your utmost need, by all sole trade was blood and carnage. As they that you hold dear upon the earth and sacred abstained totally from plundering the peasants, and directed their attacks in general against sign, or token, or in any other manner whatpersons who were in some way obnoxious to ever, anything that you have seen from the the better part of the population, the green moment that you quitted the dungeon above, riders were far from unpopular throughout or that you may see as I lead you hence. the country. Many of them were known to show themselves familiarly at village feasts and merry-makings; and upon the borders of France and Flanders, their general name had been changed, from these circumstances, into that of les verts gallants, though it seemed me the means of betraying you, even if I that their principal leader was more particularly distinguished by this appellation. Nor was this the only effect of their popularity, which produced for themselves a much more beneficial result, by making both peasant and burgher, and even many of the feudal lords themselves, anxious to connive at the escape of the green riders, whenever they were pursued by very superior bodies of troops.

Into the hands of some one of their parties Albert Maurice now clearly saw that he had fallen; and as the sort of romantic life which they led had caused a thousand stories to be spread concerning them-some strange and extraordinary enough, but none more common than that of their finding access into towns and castles without any visible means,—their connection with the dwelling which he was just quitting required no explanation to the young citizen.

leaned, with one end resting on the floor, a had led Albert Maurice thither, closed the common pike or reiter's lance, and a large heavy door which cut off the communication two-handed sword. A barrel of wine, as it with the staircase, and locked and barred it seemed, occupied one corner of the apart- with no small precaution. Advancing towards the table, he shook the slumberer by the on which stood a large leathern bottle, or shoulder, who starting up, merely required a bottliau, with two or three drinking horns. sentry, at the mouth of a dark passage which entered the other side of the chamber.

'Now, sir burgher,' said the Vert Gallant, approaching towards Albert Maurice, 'You have penetrated into places which the eye of none of your cast or craft ever beheld before; and, as you have been led thither solely for your benefit and safety, you must take a serious oath, for the security of those who

'That I will willingly,' replied Albert Mau-

it may prove a benefit to me or not.

symbol of our salvation, by your faith in the Saviour who died upon the cross, by your beyond the earth, never to reveal, by word,

'Willingly do I swear,' replied Albert Maurice, and he pressed the hilt of the sword upon his lips. 'Nevertheless,' he added, 'for the security of all, fair sir, I would rather that, by bandaging my eyes, you should take from would.'

' Hast thou no confidence in thine own honour?' demanded the Vert Gallant. 'If so, by the Lord I regret that I took the trouble to save so scurvy a clown.

The eye of the prisoner flashed, and his cheek grew red; but, after a moment's pause, he replied, 'Not so. It is not that I doubt my own honour, for I have sworn not to betray you, or to reveal anything that I may see; and that torture has not yet been invented by the demons who are permitted to rule so much upon our earth, that could tear from me one word in violation of that oath. Nevertheless, sir, I would rather be able to say that I cannot, than that I will not tell, and therefore I proposed the means at which you scoff without cause.

'Thou art right, and I am wrong, stranger,' answered the other. 'Be it so then. With The moment he had entered the chamber this scarf I will bind up thine eyes. But which we have just described, the Vert Gallant, first,' he added, 'take a draught of this wine, for thou wilt have to travel far ere morn-

young burgher, who drank it off. The Vert Gallant himself, however, did not unclose the visor of his helmet, to partake of the beverage he gave to the other. As soon as the young citizen had drained the cup, his guide took the scarf from the bench, and bound it over his eyes, saying with a light laugh, as he did so, 'I am clumsy at the work with these gauntlets on, but better have my fingers busy at thy temples, than the hangman's busy at thy neck. Now give me thy hand,' he added, ' the way is rough, so mind thy footing as we

Albert Maurice was now led forward to the mouth of the passage, at which the other adventurer stood; and he then advanced for some way over an uneven pavement, till at length he was told that there were steps to descent, the sound of merriment burst clear upon his ear. 'Now, pause for a moment,' struck three hard blows with his mailed hand, caused by the turning of more than one key, and by the removing of more than one large bar-the door was apparently thrown open, and Albert Maurice could tell, by the freer air that he breathed, that he was led forward into some apartment of much larger dimensions than any he had yet seen. No voice was heard; but the sound of moving feet, and seats pushed on one side, as well as the steam of wine and dressed meats, showed clearly that they had now entered some scene of late or present festivity. The person who had conducted him thither soon let go his hand, but at the same time he heard his voice, exclaiming, 'Now, unbind his eyes for a few minutes! Have my orders been obeyed?'

While several voices were busily answering this question, by detailing the despatch of a number of messengers, as it seemed, in different directions, and for purposes which Albert Maurice could not gather from what was said, two persons undid the scarf which covered his eyes, and he suddenly found himself in a scene which may need a more detailed description.

The apartment in which he stood, if apartment it could be called, was neither more nor So saying, he filled one of the horns upon less than an immense cavern, or excavation in the table to the brim, and presented it to the the limestone rock, from which, as it bore evidently the traces of human labour, it is probable that at some remote period the stone for constructing one or several large buildings had been hewn out. In height it might be twenty or five-and-twenty feet, and in width it was considerably more; the length was about eighty yards, and the farther end, on one side, was closed by a wooden partition. Overhead the rock was left rough and irregular, but the sides, to very near the top, were perpendicular, and tolerably smooth, while the floor, or rather the ground, had of course been made as level as possible in its original construction, for the purpose of rolling out the blocks of stone with greater facility. Extending down the centre of this spacious apartment was a table, covered with various sorts of food. The viands which it sustained condescend. Of these there were about thirty, sisted chiefly of immense masses of solid meat, and he remarked, as he went down, that the air amongst which, though beef and mutton bore became very close and oppressive. He thought, a certain share, yet the stag, the wild boar, too, that he heard many voices speaking and and the fallow deer, with other of the forest laughing beyond; and as he proceeded, it tenants, had contributed not a little to make became clear that it was so, for by the time he up the entertainment. On either side of this and his guide had reached the bottom of the table, which, by the way, was itself formed of planks, on which the traces of the saw were much more evident than those of the plane, said his companion, and at the same time he were ranged an innumerable multitude of benches, stools, and settles of the same rude upon what seemed to be a door. All instantly description. From these had risen up, as it became silent within, and then a single blow seemed, on the entrance of the prisoner and upon the wood-work was struck from the his companion, the mixed population of the other side. It was answered in the same cavern, consisting of nearly two hundred manner, by one stroke more; and in the cavaliers, as sturdy, and, apparently, as veteran next moment—after the clattering and grating as ever mounted horse or drew a sword; and, when the bandage was removed from the eyes of the young citizen, he found that a number of those whose habiliments seemed to point them out as the most distinguished, were thronging round the person who had led him thither.

> ' John and Nicholas have gone to the west,' cried one, 'to tell the band of St. Bavon to keep beyond Ramilies,'-' Adolph of Sluy, cried another, 'has tidings by this time that he must remain within the bounds of Liege,' - 'The little monk, too,' said an old, white-headed man, of a florid, healthy complexion, which showed that time had hitherto wrestled with him nearly in vain,-' the little monk, too, is trotting away on his mule towards Mierdorp, though he complained bitterly of being obliged to set out before the feast was on the table, and has carried away, in his wallet, a roasted hare from the fire, as long as my arm, and a bottle of the old Bonne that we got out of the cellar of Ambly.

> 'He shall feast well another time for his pains,' replied the Vert Gallant, moving towards the head of the table, at which a large armed chair stood vacant,- 'he shall feast the whole day. If, notwithstanding all, you but we must make this stranger taste of our hospitality while the horses are saddling without. Sit down, sir citizen,' he added, turning to Albert Maurice, 'sit down, and refresh vacant seat by his side.

'I thank you, sir,' replied the young citizen; but the grief I have undergone, and the anxieties I have suffered, have dulled the edge of appetite with me more than the banquet of a prince could have done; and I would fain see myself once more upon my road to Ghent, if such be the fate intended for me.

'Ha! ha!' exclaimed the old man whom we have before noticed. 'See what frail things these burghers are, that a little anxiety and fear should take away their appetite; but thou wilt drink, good friend, if thou wilt not eat. Here, merry men all, fill to the brim, and drink with me to our noble leader,--"Here's to the Vert Gallant of Hannut!'

The proposal was like an electric shock to all. Each man started to his feet, and with loud voice and overflowing cup, drank, 'To the Vert Gallant of Hannut! and may the sword soon restore him to what the sword took from him!

'Thank you, my friends, thank you,' replied the Vert Gallant, as soon as their acclamation had subsided, - 'I drink to you all, with many thanks,' and so saying, he raised the visor of his helmet sufficiently to allow himself to bring the cup to his lip. The eye of the young burgher fixed eagerly upon him. anxious, as may be well supposed, to behold the countenance of a man holding such an extraordinary station. What was his surprise. however, when the small degree in which the leader of the green riders suffered his face to appear exposed to view the countenance of a negro.

CHAPTER X.

THE ESCAPE.

An involuntary exclamation of astonishment burst from the lips of Albert Maurice, and the Vert Gallant instantly closed his helmet.

' Now, sir citizen,' he said, without noticing the other's surprise, 'we will once more forward on our way. Some one bind his eyes again; and you, good Matthew, lend me your ear for a moment. Mark well,' he said, speaking in a lower voice, - 'mark well that forward any proofs against you. But mark all the precautions are taken which I ordered. Be sure the tracks of the horses' feet, for more than a mile, be completely effaced. Roll the have such friends and companions about you large stones down, as I told you, over the mouth, and let not a man show his head during well another time for his pains, good Matthew; should be discovered, and the fools will rush upon their fate, send round fifty men by the back of the rock, and, on your life, let not one of the band escape. I say not slay them: take every man to mercy that is willing; but suffer yourself before you go; ' and he pointed to a not one living man to pass the bounds of the forest if they once discover you. If, however, they miss the track entirely, as doubtless they will, then, should I not see you before to-morrow night, pick me out fifty of the best riders, and the quickest handed men; let their horses be saddled, and not a break in their mail; for I do not purpose that this Prévôt should hie him back to Brussels without being met withal.

By the time he had given these directions, the scarf was once more bound round the eyes of Albert Maurice, and he was again led forward by the hand, apparently passing through several halls and passages. In one instance, the peculiar smell of horses, and the various sounds that he heard, convinced him that he was going through a stable; and, in a few minutes after, receiving a caution to walk carefully, he was guided down a steep descent, at the end of which the free open air blew cool upon his cheek. The bandage was not removed, however, for some moments, though, by feeling the grass and withered leaves beneath his feet, he discovered that he was once more under the boughs of the forest.

At length the voice of him who had been his conductor throughout, desired him to halt, and uncover his eyes, which he accordingly did, and found himself, as he expected, in the deepest part of the wood.

'Now follow me on, sir citizen,' said the Vert Gallant, 'and as we go, I will tell you how you must conduct yourself. Make your way straight to Mierdorp, where you will arrive probably in the grey of the dawn. you are going into the village, you will be joined by a certain monk, to whom you will say, 'Good morrow, Father Barnabas,' and he will immediately conduct you on your road towards Namur. Halt with him at the village where you were first arrested. Speak with the syndic, or deacon, or any other officer of the place, and get together all the written testimony you can concerning the cause of your arrest; then return to Ghent if you will. It may be that no accuser ever will appear against you, but if there should, boldly appeal to the Princess Mary, who is left behind by her father at Ghent. State the real circumstances which caused your arrest at the Gembloux, and call upon your accuser to bring well, and remember, walk not late by night. Go not forth into the streets alone. Always as may witness your arrest, and second your appeal to the Princess. For there are such things, sir citizen, as deaths in prison without tation, the plan which had been pointed out judgment.

'I shall remember with gratitude, sir,' replied the young burgher, 'all that you have been pleased to say, and all that you have done in my behalf. But on one point I must needs think you mistake: If I know where I am rightly, we are full sixteen miles from Mierdorp,—a distance which would take four good hours to walk. The castle clock has just struck three, so that it may be broad day, and not merely dawn, before I can reach that place.'

'Fear not, fear not,' replied the stranger, 'you shall have the means of reaching it in time; but follow me quick, for the hours wear.' Thus saying, he strode on through the trees and brushwood, pursuing a path, which, though totally invisible to the eyes of his companion, he seemed to tread with the most perfect certainty. Sometimes the occasional underwood appeared to cover it over entirely; and often the sweeping boughs of the higher trees drooped across it, and dashed the night dew upon the clothes of the travellers, as they pushed through them; but still the Vert Gallant led on. In about ten minutes, the glancing rays of the sinking moon, seen shining through the leaves before them, showed that they were coming to some more open ground; and the next moment they stood upon the principal road which traversed

By the side of the highway, with an ordinary groom holding the bridle, stood a strong bony horse; and the only further words that were spoken, were, 'The road lies straight before you to the west; mount, and God speed you, Give the horse to the monk when you are in safety,'

"A thousand thanks and blessings on your head!" replied the young burgher; and springing with easy grace into the saddle, he struck the horse with his heel, and darted off towards Mierdorp.

'A likely cavalier as ever I saw!' exclaimed the Vert Gallant. 'Now, to cover, to cover,' he added, turning to the groom, and once more plunged into the forest.

In the mean while Albert Maurice road on; and with his personal adventures we shall now be compelled to proceed for some way, leaving the other characters for fate to play with as she lists, till we have an opportunity of resuming their history also.

The horse that bore the young burgher, though not the most showy that ever underwent the saddle, proved strong, swift, and willing; and as it is probably impossible for a man just liberated from prison, with the first sense of recovered freedom fresh upon him, to ride slowly, Albert Maurice dashed on for some way at full speed. His mind had adopted, without a moment's doubt or hesi-

to him by the leader of the adventurers, as the very best which, under his present circumstances, he could pursue; and this conviction, -together with the proofs he had already received that the wishes of the Vert Gallant were friendly and generous towards himself, and the intimate knowledge which his deliverer had displayed of his affairs, -made him resolve to follow implicitly his directions. Although this resolution was brought about by the mental operation of a single moment, it is not to be supposed that the various events which had befallen him, since entering the castle of Hannut, had not produced on his mind all those effects of wonder, surprise, and doubt, which they might naturally be expected to cause in the bosom of any person so circumstanced.

There were a thousand things that he could not in any way account for, and which we shall not attempt to account for either. interest which his deliverer had taken in his fate; the means by which he had acquired such an exact knowledge of his situation; the existence of so large a band of free companions, notwithstanding all the efforts which the Duke of Burgundy had directed against them, were all matters of astonishment. He had felt, however, during his short intercourse with the green riders, that neither the time, the place, nor the circumstances admitted of any inquiry upon the subject; and with a prompt decision, which was one great trait in his character, while he took advantage of the means of escape offered to him, he had suppressed as far as possible every word which might have betrayed surprise or curiosity. As he rode on, however, he pondered on all that had happened; and he doubted not, that, now that he was at liberty to seek and collect the proofs of his innocence, he should find little difficulty in clearing himself from any absolute crime, if his cause were submitted to a regular tribunal. Unfortunately, this did not always occur. In most of the continental states the will of the Prince was law; and too often the same absolute jurisdiction was exercised by his officers. This was especially the case in respect to Maillotin du Bac, who, in one morning, had been known to arrest and hang thirty persons, without any form of trial or judicial investigation.

Nevertheless, all these circumstances seemed to have been fully considered by the Vert Gallant; and the means he had pointed out of an appeal to the Princess Mary, in case of unjust persecution, were, as the young burgher well knew, the only ones that could prove efficacious.

sense of recovered freedom fresh upon him, to so well had the distance and the horse's ride slowly, Albert Maurice dashed on for speed been calculated, that, at about two some way at full speed. His mind had miles from Mierdorp, that undefinable grey adopted, without a moment's doubt or hesitint, which can scarcely be called light, but is the first approach towards it, began to spread upwards over the eastern sky; and by the time that Albert Maurice emerged from the forest of Hannut, which then extended to within a mile of the village, the air was all rosy with the dawn of day. Just as he was issuing forth from the woodland, he perceived before him a stout, short, round figure, covered with a long grey gown, the cowl or hood of which was thrown back upon his shoulders, leaving a polished bald head to shine uncovered in the rays of the morning; and the young fugitive paused to examine the person whom he had by this time nearly overtaken.

The monk, for so he appeared to be, was mounted on a stout, fat mule, whose grey skin, and sleek, rotund limbs, gave him a ridiculous likeness to his rider, which was increased by a sort of vacant sentimentality, that appeared in the round face of the monk, and the occasional slow raising and dropping of one of the mule's ears, in a manner which bears no other epithet but that of lack-a-dai-sical.

According to the instructions he had received, the young burgher immediately rode up to the monk, and addressed him with the 'Good morrow, Father Barnabas,' which he had been directed to employ.

'Good morrow, my son,' replied the monk; though unhappily for me, sinner that I am, my patron saint is a less distinguished one than him whose name you give me; I am called Father Charles, not Father Barnabas.

As he thus spoke he looked up in the young traveller's face with an air of flat unmeaningness, which would at once have convinced Albert Maurice that he was mistaken in the more intellectual expression beam the next moment through the dull, grey eye of the deserve the name of a smile, and yet was far too faint for a grin.

'Well,' said he, eyeing him keenly, 'if your name be not Barnabas, good Father, I will give you good morrow once more, and ride on.

'Good morrow, my son,' replied the monk, with the same demure smile; and Albert Maurice, to be as good as his word, put his horse into a trot, in order to make the best of his way towards Mierdorp, which was lying in the fresh, sweet light of morning, at the distance of about three quarters of a mile before him. To his surprise, however, the monk's mule without any apparent effort of its rider, the moment he quickened his horse's pace, put itself into one of those long, easy ambles for which mules are famous, and without difficulty that the profundity of a deep stream is often carried its master on by his side.

'You are in haste, my son,' said the monk:

' whither away so fast?

'I go to seek Father Barnabas,' replied the young burgher, somewhat provoked, but yet half laughing at the quiet merriment of the monk's countenance as he rode along beside him on his mule, with every limb as round as if he had been formed out of a series of pumpkins.

Well, well, answered the monk, 'perhaps I may aid you in your search; but what wouldst thou with Father Barnabas, when thou hast found him? Suppose I were Father Barnabas now, what wouldst thou say to me?

'I would say nothing,' replied Albert Maurice; 'but-let us on our way.

'So be it then,' replied the other; 'but one thing, good brother, it does not become me to go jaunting over the country with profane laymen; therefore if we are to journey forward together, you must don the frock. and draw the hood over your head, to hide that curly black hair. So turn your horse's bridle rein before we get into the village, and behind those old hawthorn bushes, I will see whether my wallet does not contain the wherewithal to make thee as good a monk as myself.'

As it now became sufficiently evident to the young citizen that he was not deceived in the person whom he had addressed, he acquiesced in his proposal; and turning down a little lane to their right hand, they dismounted from their beasts behind a small, thick clump of aged thorns, and the monk soon produced from a large leathern wallet which he carried behind him, a grey gown, exactly similar to his own, which completely covered and concealed the handsome form person, had he not discovered a small ray of of the young citizen. The cowl having been drawn entirely over his head, and the frock bound round his middle by a rope, they once monk, while something curled, and just curled, more mounted; and pursuing their way tothe corners of his mouth with what did not gether, soon found means to turn the conversation to the direct object which they had in view, with which it appeared the monk was fully acquainted.

The ice having been once broken, Albert Maurice found his companion a shrewd, intelligent man, with a strong touch of roguish humour, which, though partly concealed under an affectation of stolidity, had grown into such a habit of jesting, that it seemed scarcely possible to ascertain when he was serious, and when he was not. This, however, might be, in some degree, assumed; for it is wonderful how often deep feelings and deep designs, intense affection, towering ambition, and even egregious cunning itself, attempt to cover themselves over by different shades of playful gaiety, knowing hidden by the light ripple on its surface.

anything but wanting in sense, and proved of of his doing so.

'Ventre Saint Gris!' cried one of the

ledge of the world.

the little town of Gembloux, at which he had been arrested by Maillotin du Bac, obtained the magistrate of the place, to prove that the first squabble between himself and the Prévôt horrible oath, that for striking his follower, fied that half the dangers of his situation were ruption. gone, Albert Maurice gladly turned his horse's head towards his native place. The monk still accompanied him, saying that he had orders not to leave him till he was safe within the walls of Ghent,- 'seeing that you are such a sweet, innocent lamb,' he added, 'that you are not to be trusted amongst the wolves of this world alone.'

Their journey passed over, however, without either danger or difficulty; for though at Gembloux Albert Maurice had laid aside the frock, as his very inquiries would of course have made his person known, he had resumed it, by the monk's desire, as soon as they had quitted the town; and that garb procured them a good reception in all the places at which they paused upon the thought fit to take new precautions; and requested his young companion to make use of the mule which he had hitherto ridden himself, while he mounted the horse. He also drew his own cowl far over his head; nor were these steps in vain, as they very soon had occasion to experience.

They reached, the gates of Ghent towards sunset, on a fine clear evening, and passed through many a group of peasantry, returning from the market in the city, to their rural occupations. On these, the monk showered his benedictions very liberally; but Albert Maurice remarked, that as they approached a small party of soldiers near the gate, his companion assumed an air of military erectness, and caused his horse to prance and curvet like a war steed. Perhaps, had he noticed what the keen eye of the monk had instantly perceived, that two of the soldiers were examining them as they came up with more than ordinary care, he might have guessed that the object of all this parade of one fancying himself fit to lead hosts and to horsemanship was to draw attention upon govern kingdoms; and every now and then himself, as a skilful conjuror forces those, to whom he offers the cards, to take the very steps, was remarked flitting from house to

However that might be, his companion was one he wishes, without their being conscious of Ghent, by his keen foresight and know- soldiers to the other, as they came near. 'It must be him! That is no monk, Jenkin!-With his co-operation Albert Maurice, at Pardi! I will see, however. Father, your e little town of Gembloux, at which he had cowl is awry!' he added, laying his hand upon the monk's bridle rein, and snatching full and sufficient evidence, written down by at his hood as if for the sake of an insolent joke. The cowl instantly fell back under his hand, exposing the fat bald head of the had arisen in a wanton aggression committed friar; and the soldier, with a broad laugh, by one of the soldiers of the latter; and that retired, disappointed, amongst his companbefore that officer had opened any of the ions, suffering the young citizen, who, on papers in his possession, he had sworn, with a the still, quiet mule, had escaped without observation, to proceed with the monk to the he would hang him over the gates of Ghent. dwelling of good Martin Fruse, which they All this was attested in due form; and satis- reached without further annoyance or inter-

CHAPTER XI.

THE PROVOST MARSHAL BEAT.

ALTHOUGH the soldiers that Albert Maurice and his companion had passed at the gate, with the usual reckless gaiety of their profession, had been found laughing lightly, and jesting with each other, yet it soon became evident to the eyes of the travellers, as they passed onward through the long irregular streets of the city, that something had occurred to affect the population of Ghent in an unusual manner.

Scarce a soul was seen abroad; and there As they approached Ghent, Father Barnabas was a sort of boding calmness in the aspect of the whole place, as they rode on, which taught them to expect important tidings of some kind, from the first friend they should meet. The misty evening sunshine streamed down the far perspective of the streets, casting long and defined shadows from the fountains and the crosses, and the houses, that every here and there obtruded their insolent gables beyond the regular line of the other buildings; but no lively groups were seen amusing themselves at the corners, or by the canals; no sober citizens sitting out before their doors, in all the rich and imposing colours of Flemish costume, to enjoy the cool tranquillity of the evening, after the noise, and the bustle, and the heat of an active summer's day. One or two persons, indeed, might be observed with their heads close together, and the important forefinger laid with all the energy of demonstration in the palm of the other hand, while the party gossiped eagerly over some great event, each some rapid figure, with consequence in all its house, the receptacle and carrier of all the mon spoonful. Do not the best leeches in rumours of the day.

Though in one of the last-named class of personages whom Albert Maurice met as he advanced, he recognised an acquaintance, yet, for many reasons, he only drew the cowl more completely over his face; and, secure in the concealment of the monk's frock that covered him, he rode on, till he reached the dwelling of his uncle, Martin Fruse, which he judged to be a more secure asylum than his own, till such time as his resolutions were taken, and his plans arranged.

The dwelling of the worthy burgher, though occupying no inconsiderable part of one of the principal streets, had its private entrance in a narrower one branching to the south-west; and the tall houses on either hand, acting as complete screens between the portal and the setting sun, gave at least an hour's additional darkness to the hue of evening.

So deep, indeed, was the gloom, and so completely did the friar's gown conceal the person of Albert Maurice, that one of his uncle's oldest servants, who was standing in the entrance, did not in any degree recognise his young master, though it was his frequent boast that he had borne the young citizenthe pink of the youth of Ghent-upon his knee a thousand times when he was no higher than an ell wand. Even the familiar stride with which Albert Maurice entered the long, dark passage, as soon as he had dismounted from his mule, did not undeceive him; and he ran forward into the large sitting room, which just alighted at the door.

He was followed straight into the apartment of Martin Fruse by that worthy citizen's the midst of half-a-dozen of the richest burghers, enjoying an hour of social converse was perfectly correct, and that some events with their wealthy neighbour before they of general and deep importance had taken retired to their early rest. It would seem to belong more to the antiquary than to the 'I see,' he said, in reply, after having historian to describe the appearance of the answered their first salutation,—'I see that chamber, or the dress of the personages who were seated on benches around it; and it may suffice to say, that the furred gowns, and gold evinced the municipal dignity of the guests.

At the moment of his nephew's entrance, At the moment of his nephew's entrance, likely to hear any public tidings.'

Martin Fruse was upon his feet, following round a serving boy, who, with a small silver the news?—that the Duke has been beaten cup, and flask of the same metal, was distributing to each of the burghers a modicum of with which he was besieging Morat, have been a liquor now, alas! too common, but which killed or taken?' was then lately invented; and was knownfrom the many marvellous qualities attributed heard that the Duke of Lorrain is advancing to it—by the name of Eau de Vie.

'Take but one small portion,' said the worthy citizen to one of his companions, who made some difficulty; 'not more than a com-

Europe recommend it as a sovereign cure for all diseases, and a preservation against bad air? It warms the stomach, strengthens the bones, clears the head, and promotes all the functions. And, truly, these are sad and troublous times, wherein cordials are necessary, and every man requires such consolation as he can find. Alack, and a well-a-day! who would have thought-

But the speech of good Martin Fruse was brought to a sudden conclusion by the entrance of his man, announcing the coming of the two monks; which notice was scarcely given, when Albert Maurice himself appeared. Before entering, the young citizen had paused one moment to cast off the friar's gown, on account of the strange voices he heard as he advanced along the passage, and he now showed himself in his usual travelling dress, though his apparel was somewhat disarranged, and he appeared without cap or bonnet.

'Welcome, welcome, my fair nephew!' cried Martin Fruse, who looked upon Albert with no small pride and deference. 'Sirs, here is my nephew Albert, come, at a lucky hour, to give us his good counsel and assistance in the strange and momentous circumstances in which we are placed.

'Welcome, most welcome, good Master Maurice!' cried a number of voices at once. Welcome, most welcome! and the young traveller, instantly surrounded by his fellowcitizens, was eagerly congratulated on his return, which had apparently been delayed lay at the end of the vestibule, announcing longer than they had expected or had wished. that two monks, somewhat of the boldest, had At the same time, the often-repeated words, · Perilous times—extraordinary circumstances -dangers to the state-anxious expectations, and a number of similar expressions, showed nephew, who immediately found himself in him that the opinion he had formed, from the appearance of the town as he passed through place.

something must have occurred with which I am unacquainted. Remember, my good friends, that I have been absent from the city chains, which decorated the meeting, sufficiently for some weeks; and, for the last four or five days, I have been in places where I was not near the lake of Neufchâtel, and all the forces

'How!' exclaimed another, 'have you not towards Flanders with all speed?'

'Some say he will be at Ghent in a week,' cried a third.

But the worst news of all, said a fourth, and left him no other feeling for the time than single word. pain at the ocean of misfortunes which had fered, as a despot; and upon the nobles, who vation, when another of the burghers changed in general bore the brunt of battle or defeat, the immediate topic of conversation. as a number of petty tyrants more insupport-Are these reports quite sure?'

keep the rebellious commons under the rule their own trees.'

of law.

insignificant-looking person, whose figure before, 'how did he meet with such a mishap? would not have attracted a moment's atten- He boasted that he would not leave a routier, tion, and whose face might have equally or a free companion in the land. passed without notice, had not the keen sparkling light of two clear black eyes, which nounced these words, recalled suddenly to his seemed to wander constantly about in search memory, that he had been followed into the of other people's thoughts, given at least some room by the monk called Father Barnabas; warning that there was a subtle, active, and and, congratulating himself that he had sufintriguing soul concealed within that diminu-fered not a syllable to escape his lips that tive and unprepossessing form. His name might commit him in any degree, he turned was Ganay; by profession he was a druggist; towards the companion of his journey, who, and the chief, in that city, of a trade, which in the haste and confusion with which all differed considerably from that of druggist in these tidings had been poured forth upon the present day, and which was one of no him, had been forgotten by himself and oversmall importance in a great manufacturing looked by the others. town like Ghent, where all the different fabrics required, more or less, some of those ingre- pearance, and in general reference to great dients which he imported from foreign coun- services received from him on the road, intries. In pronouncing the last words, 'to stantly called upon Father Barnabas the goodkeep the rebellious commons under the rule humoured civilities and attention of Martin of law,' the druggist fixed his keen black eyes Fruse, and might have turned the conversation upon the face of Albert Maurice with an ex- to other matters, had not the monk himself pression of inquiring eagerness, partly pro- seemed determined to hear more of the drubceeding from an anxious desire to see into the bing which had been bestowed upon Maillotin heart of the young citizen, whose character du Bac. the other fully estimated, partly from a design to lead him-by showing him what was ex, a tone in which the merriment so far pre-pected from him-to say something which dominated over the commiseration, as to render might discover his views and feelings.

in a solemn and mysterious tone, 'is, that a tainty that his words were to be marked put squire, who arrived at the palace last night, the young citizen upon his guard; and consaw the Duke stricken from his horse by a scious that there were mighty events gathering Swiss giant with a two-handed sword; and, round,—that his own situation was precarious, according to all accounts, he never rose again.'—and that of his country still more so,—he Good God! is it possible? exclaimed felt the necessity of obtaining perfect certainty Albert Maurice, as all these baleful tidings with regard to the facts, and of indulging poured in at once upon his ear, with a rapidity deep reflection in regard to the consequences, which afforded him scarcely an opportunity of before he committed himself in the irretrievestimating the truth of each as he received it, able manner which is sometimes effected by a

'Ha!' he exclaimed; 'ha! did he say so?' overwhelmed his country—though he looked —and he was about to drop the dangerous upon the Prince, who had immediately sufpart of the subject, by some common obser-

'But there is more news still, good Master able than one great one. 'Good God! is it Albert Maurice,' exclaimed a little fat merpossible?' he exclaimed; 'but are you sure, chant, whose face expressed all that extravamy friends, he continued, after a moment's gant desire of wondering, and of exciting pause, 'that all this news is true? Rumour is wonder, which goes greatly to form the characapt to exaggerate, and increases evil tidings ter of a newsmonger;—'but there is more tenfold, where she only doubles good news. news still, which you will be delighted to hear, as a good citizen, and a friend to honest 'Oh! they are beyond all doubt,' replied men. That pitiful, prying, blood-thirsty tyone of the merchants, with a slight curl of the rant, Maillotin du Bac, was brought into the lip. 'The Lord of Imbercourt, who was on town to-day in a litter, beaten so sorely, that his march to join the army, when he received they say there is not a piece of his skin so big couriers bearing these evil tidings, returned as a Florence crown that is not both black with his spears in all haste to Ghent, to guard and blue. Faith, I wonder that the honest against any disturbance, as he said, and to men of the wood did not hang him to one of

'Ha!' again exclaimed Albert Maurice, but The man who spoke this was a small, dark, in a tone far more raised with surprise than

A low chuckle just behind him, as he pro-

A few sentences in explanation of his ap-

'Verily, poor gentleman,' he exclaimed, in it much more like the voice of malice than of He was deceived, however: the very cer- pity; - verily, poor gentleman, he must be rible accident?'

newsmonger, eager to disburden his wallet of into the abyss before them, were the least information upon a new ear; 'what I am go-inclined to venture their opinions ere they ing to tell you is quite true, I can assure you, heard those of others: for my maid Margaret's sister is going to be married to one of the soldiers of the Prévôt's some men have of what is passing in the band. It seems that they had searched the breasts of those around them, Albert Maurice, forest of Hannut all day in vain, for a body without the slightest exertion of cunning of of the green riders who had taken refuge shrewdness,—without one effort to draw forth there, and also for a prisoner who had made the thoughts of those by whom he was surhis escape; and towards night they were rounded,—comprehended clearly the peculiar making for Hal, because they would not go modifications under which each one present back to Hannut, as the Prévôt had some was revolving in his own mind what advan-quarrel with the Chatelain, when suddenly, tages might be derived from—what opportuin the little wood, near Braine-la-Leud, they nities might be afforded by—the discomfiture were met by a party of fifty free companions, who drew up right across their way. The those immunities and privileges which that Captain, who, they say, was the famous Vert prince had wrung from Ghent, after they had Gallant of Hannut himself, singled out the been too often abused by her citizens. His Prévôt, and at the very first charge of the two first thought had been of the same nature bands brought him to the ground with his also: but the mention of Maillotin du Bac lance. Du Bac, however, was not hurt, and had suddenly recalled to his mind his own at first refused to yield; but the Vert Gallant particular circumstances and situation; and cudgelled him with the staff of his lance, till there was not a piece of his armour would it was entirely directed to the consideration of hold together. seems; and when the whole of the band were ensured by the events, the news of which had dispersed, which they were in five minutes, reached Ghent during his absence. with the exception of five or six who were others who had been taken.'

monk stole from time to time a glance at the Ghent, he thought, might be benefited, not acc of Albert Maurice with an expression of only Ghent might be freed, but the whole merriment, triumph, and malice, all mingled of Flanders might acquire a degree of liberty intimately together, but subdued into a look she had never known. Still, as he reflected, of quiet from which climbed a smile from the of quiet fun, which elicited a smile from the the image thus presented to his mind in-lip of the young citizen, though the tale he creased, and like the cloud of smoke in the had just heard furnished him with matter eastern fable, which, rolling forth from the for more serious reflection. The eyes of the mouth of the small vase, gradually condensed druggist also fixed upon him, while the story of into the form of an enormous giant, the the Prévôt's discomfiture was told by their thoughts which at first had referred alone to companion; and the smile which he saw play his personal safety enlarged in object, and upon the face of the young burgher seemed grew defined in purpose. to furnish him with information of what was passing in the mind within, sufficient at least under the oppression of the feudal system, for his own purposes; for from that moment decayed, corrupted, and abused; and as Alhe appeared to pay little attention to the sub- bert Maurice mused, he fancied that the freeject before them, otherwise than by mingling dom of Ghent and Flanders once established, casually in the conversation that succeeded.

the great political events of the day, the fate might throw off the weary yoke under which of their country, the state of the city itself, they had laboured for ages: the rights of and the future prospects of the land, without, every human being might become generally however, approaching so near to the danger- recognised over the whole surface of the ous matter which was probably in the heart globe; and broken chains and acclamations of every one, as to call forth words that could of joy, the song of freedom and the shout of

in a sad case. How met he with such a ter- not be retracted. In fact, each person present felt burdened by great but ill arranged 'Why, Father, you shall hear,' replied the thoughts; and those who saw most deeply

With that sort of intuitive perception which it must be confessed, that, for a few minutes, He would not kill him, it how greatly his own personal safety might be

The moment after, however, he upbraided taken prisoners, the Vert Gallant struck off himself for his selfishness; and, casting all inthe Prévôt's spurs with his axe, and, telling dividual considerations away, he determined him that he was a false traitor, and no true to bend the whole energies of his mind to reap, knight, sent him back to Ghent, with all the from the circumstances of the times, the greatest possible degree of benefit for his While the burgher was detailing these parnative city. As he pondered over it, the old ticulars, the small grey roguish eyes of the aspirations of his soul revived. Not only

The whole continent at that time groaned might afford an example to France, to Europe, That conversation became soon of a ramb- to the world. The trampled serf, the enling and desultory nature, wandering round chained bondsman, the oppressed citizen, triumph, presented themselves in hurried remained, should sleep in the little grey cham-visions to his imagination, while patriotism ber over the warehouse. still represented a liberated world hailing his return to their dwellings. Although it was exercises and devout exclamations. now night, several of them, before they set rice, without ever attempting to force himself twenty golden crowns into his hand. into prominent situations, without effort or exertions of any kind, had taught the whole little leathern bag, whose weight, as it sunk people of the city of Ghent to look to him for into his palm, seemed to convey to him a full extraordinary events; and thus each man who idea of its value; and then, raising his merry heard of his return, generally stole forth to grey eyes to the face of his travelling comtell it to his next door neighbour, who again told it to a third. The gossip and the newsmonger gave it forth liberally to others like indeed I cannot accept it, except upon one themselves; so that by a very early hour the condition. next morning the return of Albert Maurice, with a variety of falsehoods and absurdities grafted thereon by the imaginations of the was about to affect some notable piece of disretailers, was generally known not only to those who were personally acquainted with him, but to a number of others who had never replied Father Barnabas, 'that in case you seen him in their lives.

CHAPTER XII.

A CONSPIRATOR.

THE appetite for news is like the appetite for son? every other thing, stimulated by a small portion of food; and the various unsatisfactory reports which had reached Ghent during the day made her good citizens devour the tidings greediness.

In the meanwhile, the young merchant communicated to his uncle, immediately after the departure of the guests, that, from various circumstances, of which he would afterwards inform him, he judged it not expedient to return to his own house for the time being. He prayed him, therefore, to allow him to occupy, for a short space, the apartments which had been appropriated to him during his youth, in day! my poor boy,' he cried; 'alack, and a the dwelling where he then was; to which well-a-day! I thought what all these travelrequest-as his nephew had originally taken lings would come to sooner or later. Good up a separate establishment much against his Lord! Good Lord! why should men travel wishes-Martin Fruse consented with no small at all! In my young days I never set my beloved brother Martin, no grey chamber for Such thoughts rendered him silent and ab- me: by my faith, I must be betaking myself stracted; and as every one else felt a degree early to-morrow to my own green chamber, of painful restraint, after lingering some time, and, in the meantime, I shall pass the night the various guests of Martin Fruse rose to with a friend of mine in the city, in pious

'Nay, nay,' replied Father Barnabas, when native land as the champion of the liberty of he heard the proposal, 'nay, nay, dearly earth.

Whether these pious exercises and devout foot within their own homes, called upon dif- exclamations might not very likely be the rapid ferent neighbours in their way, just to tell circulation of the flagon, and many a jovial them, as they said, that Master Albert Mau- bacchanalian song, there may be some reason rice was returned to Ghent. None knew to doubt. At all events, Albert Maurice had why; but yet this information seemed a piece a vague suspicion that it was so; and after of important news to all. By the sway which pressing the monk to stay, as much as hospigreat natural genius and energy insensibly tality required, he ceased his opposition to his acquire over the minds of men, Albert Mau- departure, at the same time putting a purse of

The monk gazed for a moment upon the panion, he replied, 'This is great nonsense. my son, quite unnecessary, I assure you; and

'What is that, my good father?' demanded the young burgher, supposing that the monk interestedness.

'Merely that you will promise me, my son,' should ever hereafter meet with a certain friend of ours, whom some people call the Vert Gallant of Hannut, you will be as silent as the dead about ever having given a leathern purse to poor Father Barnabas, as he may well ask, what is the use of a purse to a holy brother, who vows never to have any money to put into it. Do you understand me, my

'Perfectly, perfectly,' replied Albert Maurice, 'and promise you with all my heart never to mention it.

'So be it, then,' rejoined the monk, 'and of Albert Maurice's return with no small benedicite; -I shall take the horse and the mule out of the stable, and speed upon my way.

As soon as the monk was gone, Albert Maurice explained to his uncle, as briefly as possible, all that had occurred to him during his absence from Ghent; and the distress, agitation, and terror of the worthy burgher, at every stage of his nephew's story, were beyond all description. 'Alack, and a well-ajoy, and proposed that the monk, who still foot three leagues out of Ghent; and the first by robbers in that cursed wood of Hannut,

the cold damp ground.

to consult with him as to the best means they could adopt, in case that Maillotin du Bac should recover from the drubbing he had received, and pursue, as he doubtless would, his purpose against Albert Maurice. In some things, Martin Fruse was not deficient in shrewdness; and he instantly saw the advantages that would be gained by a personal application to the Princess, if his nephew were again arrested.

'If,' said he, 'we had still had our old laws, I should have said at once, appeal to the Eschevins, because, as we used to elect them ourselves, we should have had justice at least, if not favour. But now that the twenty-six, from the Grand Bailli down to the last secretary, are all named by the creatures of the Duke, this Maillotin du Bac gets them to warrant everything he does, while the Princess, who is kind and generous, will be sure to judge in your favour, especially when she sees the papers that prove you were first arrested for taking part with a woman; and her council, who have nothing to do with the Prévôt, will their mistress.

It was consequently determined, after some farther discussion, to follow the line of conduct by great corporeal vigour and activity. suggested by the leader of the adventurers. Such precautions as were necessary to ensure against any of those secret proceedings, which sometimes made clean conveyance with an ob-Maurice and his uncle; and the young citizen, that he had occupied as a boy.

chamber,—the quaint old tapestry, with the himself to be, by watchful and jealous eyes years;—there was something in the aspect of Ghent at least, if the reins had really fallen the whole that called up the peaceful past, and from the hand that lately held them. His first contrasted itself almost painfully with the thoughts, indeed, were all turned towards the present. Setting down the lamp which he benefit of his native country, to the immense bore in his hand, Albert Maurice cast himself advantages that might be obtained for her. on a seat, and gazing round the apartment, and to that mighty thing, liberty, which was while the thousand memories of every well scarcely then known to the world. But it known object spoke to his heart with the sweet was not in human nature, that some breathmurmuring voice of the past; and while all the ing of personal ambition should not mingle perils and anxieties of his actual situation,— with his nobler aspirations; and for a moment the imminent danger from which he had just he dreamt of power, and rule, and sovereign escaped,-the menacing fate which still hung sway, and of nobles trampled beneath his over his head,—and the fierce struggle in feet, and of kings bending to court his alliance.

time I ever was seduced to do so, I was caught which he was likely to be engaged, -pressed for present attention, he could not help exand was obliged to sleep a whole night upon claiming, 'Oh, boyhood! happy, happy boyhood! must thou never, never come again?"

The young citizen calmed his uncle's agitation as much as possible, and then proceeded soon took full possession of his thoughts; and, casting from him all cares for the individual danger which threatened himself, he applied his whole mind to consider the probable fate of his country. If the Duke of Burgundy were really dead, he saw, and had long foreseen, that great and extraordinary changes must take place. He knew that there was hardly a town throughout all Flanders, Holland, or Hainault, which was not ready to rise in arms, to recover some privilege wrested from its inhabitants.to break some chain with which they had all been enthralled. He felt, too, and it was a proud consciousness, that he, and he alone throughout the whole land, was capable of wielding that mighty engine, a roused up mul. titude, for the great purpose to which it can only be properly applied,—the benefit and the happiness of the whole. This consciousness arose from two circumstances, -a thorough and intimate acquaintance with the general characters of the principal leading men in the various towns of Flanders, together with a knowledge that each was individually selfish or weak, full of wild and unfeasible schemes, or absorbed take care not to thwart her who will one day be in narrow personal desires; and, in the second place, from the internal perception of immense powers of mind, strengthened and supported

Such qualities were not, indeed, all that was required to carry mighty schemes to a successful result, especially where they were to be founded on the consent and support of the noxious person, before any of his friends were vain and wilful multitude. But Albert Maurice aware, were then concerted between Albert had, on several occasions, tried his powers of persuading the crowd, and his ready eloquence pleading fatigue, retired to the apartments had never failed to lead, to convince, to command, Indeed, till the present moment, he had There was something in the aspect of the felt almost fearful-surrounded, as he knew eyes of many of the figures shot through by of the immense popular power that he was the arrows which he used to direct against aware he could exert. But now, as he paused them, in the wanton sport of childhood,—the and considered the probable events about to table notched with the boy's unceasing knife, — take place, he felt a triumphant security in his the well-remembered bed, in which had been own talents, and prepared to step forward. dreamed many of the pleasant dreams of early and secure a popular form of government, for when suddenly the better spirit woke him of the human race, who pretend to read in was wandering, he hid his face in his hands, with a mixed feeling of shame for having suffered himself to be betrayed into such thoughts, and an apprehension lest, in some after-part of his career, when the golden temptation was within his grasp, he should yield to the spirit that even thus early had assailed him, and be in act what he had already been in thought. The very idea of becoming so, made him pause in his resolves, uncertain whether to take any part, lest he should ultimately take an evil one; and for a moment Albert Maurice, who feared no mortal man, hesitated in fear of himself.

Reflection, however, soon removed his doubts: he knew his intentions to be pure; and, calling before his mind the brightest examples of past ages, he determined to hold them up to himself as models to imitate, and to sacrifice everything to virtue. Even the very doubts that he had entertained of himself made him choose his examples from the sternest school of patriotism. He felt, perhaps, that any modern efforts must fall below the standard of that antique firmness, which, nurtured by the long habit of freedom, was with the Romans of the Republic a passion as much as a principle; and, fixing his eyes upon the earlier Brutus, he resolved that if ever in after life the temptation to wrong his country should assail him, he would use that talismanic memory to charm the evil demon away for ever.

While he thus paused and thought, the night wore on; all sounds died away in the streets of Ghent: the footsteps in his uncle's house ceased; and, after the midnight watch had gone by in its round, not a sound for some time disturbed the silence of the place. At length, about one o'clock in the morning, he heard a step ascending the stairs which led to his apartment, and the moment after a tap upon the door announced that some one demanded admittance. He instantly rose, threw back the tapestry, and opened the when, to his surprise, he beheld the door, when, to his surprise, he benefit the small keen features and sharp black eyes of the druggist Ganay, beside the face of one of his uncle's servants.

The sight, indeed, accorded very well with his thoughts and wishes; for though the person who thus visited him was, in character and mind, as distinct, perhaps, I should say, as opposite, to himself as possible, yet he was one of those men who, in moments of general excitement, are often serviceable in the highest degree, and must be used for good, lest they should employ their talents for evil.

The little druggist had, in all his motions, a silent rapidity, a quick, sharp, but stealthy

It was but for a moment, however; and sort of activity, which, to those close observers from his dream, and showed him whither he the habitual movements and peculiar customs of the body the character of the mind within, might have spoken of dark and cunning designs, prompted by strong but carefully hidden passions, with little scruple as to the means of accomplishing schemes once undertaken. Before Albert Maurice was well aware of his presence, he was in the room beside him; and in a few brief words, spoken in a low but remarkably distinct voice, had explained to the young citizen that when he went away about two hours before, he had requested the servant to wait and let him in, after the rest of the family had gone to rest; and, adding that he had business of much importance to speak upon, he at once explained and apologised for his intrusion.

Albert Maurice took his excuses in good part; and, bidding the servant retire to rest, he closed the door and seated himself with his visitor, well aware that he had to encounter a mind as keen and penetrating, though far less powerful, than his own, on subjects difficult and dangerous to discuss

'Master Albert Maurice,' said Ganay, when they were alone, and the retreating step of the servant had announced to his cautious ear that his words were not likely to be overheard, 'it were in vain for you or I to attempt to conceal from each other, or from ourselves, that the moment is come when great and extraordinary events must take place in our native land, or opportunities be lost which may never return again. To you, then, I come, he added, speaking with a serious earnestness, which was intended to give the appearance of sincere conviction to the flattery he was about to administer-flattery which, as he knew it to be based in truth, he calculated upon being readily received, and producing a particular purpose of his own, - ' to you, then, I come, Master Albert Maurice, as to the man calculated, by nature and by circumstances, to take the most prominent part in the actions in which we are about to be engaged,-to whom the eyes of all the citizens are naturally turned, and on whom the welfare of our country must, in a great measure, depend. My object is, in no degree, to pry into your confidence, to obtrude advice upon you, or to hurry you forward faster than you may think it necessary to proceed, but simply for the purpose of offering you any assistance in my small power to give, and of pointing out to you the necessity of thought and consultation in regard to the measures to be pur-

The young citizen paused for a moment or two in thought ere he replied. 'My good friend,' he answered at length, 'much consideration is, indeed, as you say, necessary. In the first place, we are by no means certain that our noble lord the Duke is dead. If he be living, it will be our duty, as good subjects and good citizens, to give him all the aid in our power to repel his enemies and to recover his losses.'

The druggist bit his lip, and Albert Maurice continued :- 'If, indeed, he unhappily have fallen in this rash attempt against the Swiss, say what would you have us do?'

'Nay, nay, speak you,' replied the drug-gist; 'for well do we all feel that it is you must lead, and we must follow.'

"'I see but one thing that can be done,' replied the young citizen,-' humbly to tender our allegiance and our services to the heiress of the Burgundian coronet, and to petition her to confirm to us our liberties and privileges."

He spoke slowly and calmly, in a tone of voice from which nothing could be gathered in addition to the words he uttered; and in vain did the small dark eyes of his fellowcitizen scan his countenance to discover something more. His face remained completely unmoved, if it was not by a scarcely perceptible smile at the evident anxiety and agitation affected his companion.

'Good God!' cried the druggist, starting up in the first impatience of disappointed expectation, - 'Good God! little did I expect to hear such words from your lips !- But no!' he added, after a moment's pause of deep thought, during which he rapidly combined every remembered trait in the character of Albert Maurice, with his present affected calmness, and deduced from it a true conclusion in regard to his real motives. 'But no! Young man, I have marked you from your childhood. I know you as well as my own son, nay, better —for his light follies have made him an alien to my house, though not to my heart—I have seen your character develope itself—I have seen the wild spirit and petulance of boyhood become, when brought under the sway of maturer reason, that overwhelming enthusiasm, which, like a mighty river, is calm only because it is deep and powerful. Albert Maurice, you cannot deceive me; and let me tell you, that even were the course, which but now you propose to pursue, that to which your feelings and your reason really led you, the people of this country would leave you to truckle to power alone; and, though—wanting one great directing mind to curb their passions, and point their endeavours to a just conclusion—they might cast one half of Europe into anarchy, and rush upon their own destruction. Most assuredly they would do so, rather than submit again to a new despot, or place their lives and their happiness in the power of one who owns no law, no justice but his own will,

'Think you they would do so, indeed?' demanded the young citizen, well aware of the fact, but somewhat doubtful still of the entire purity of his companion's motives.-'Think you they would do so, indeed? Then, my good friend, we must, as you say, for the safety and security of all, find some one who may lead them to better things: but to succeed we must be cautious—we must trust no man before we try him; and we must first make sure of those who lead before we rouse up those who are to be led. Ere one step is taken, however, we must ensure the ground that we stand upon, and know what has been the real event of this great battle. Nay, nay, protest not that it is as we have heard. Rumour, the universal liar, sometimes will give us portions of the truth, beyond all doubt, but never yet, believe me, did she tell a tale that was not more than one half falsehood. But even granting that the chief point be true, at the very threshold of our enterprise, we must learn each particular shade of thought and of opinion possessed by our great and leading citizens. Nor must Ghent stand alone -each other city throughout all Flanders with which his calmness and indifference must be prepared to acknowledge and support the deeds of Ghent.'

'You seem to have considered the matter deeply,' said the druggist, with a smile; 'but I fear such long preparations, and the time necessary to excite the public mind-

'Fear not,' interrupted Albert Maurice, 'fear not. You little know the commons if you suppose that time is necessary to call them into action. A few shrewd words, false or true, it matters not, will set the whole country in a flame as fast as news can fly. Give me but a good occasion, and an opportunity of speech, and in one half hour all Ghent shall be in arms.

'It may be so,' replied the druggist, thoughtfully: 'I doubt it not—indeed I know it is so; but, methinks, my dear young friend, that while we are proceeding with such slow circumspection, our enemies may take their measures of precaution also; and, as they have the present power, may use and extend it to such good effect that all our efforts will be fruitless. Already the Lord of Imbercourt has returned with a hundred and fifty lances; the number of nobles in the town, with their retainers, will furnish near five hundred more.

'Again, fear not,' replied Albert Maurice; 'the popular mind is as a magazine of that black hellish compound, which gives roar and lightning to the cannon; one single spark, applied by a fearless hand, will make it all explode at once. The nobles stand upon a mine; and there are those in Ghent who will not fear to spring it beneath their feet should there be need, which Heaven avert. One thing, however, must be done, and that with speed. As an united body, these feudal meeting. A thousand to one the very fact of tyrants are powerful,—too much so, indeed, his having done so, and the scorn that it will—but amongst them there must be surely more than sufficient stores of vanity, wrath, mitting his vanity on our side, will bind him harted, revenge, and of all those other manitudes the following the first order is with a part of the reverse of the properties of the following the store of the properties of t and kind patron'—he spoke with a sneer— means be found? 'Thibalt of Neufchâtel, who affects mighty as low as to his saddle-bow, -calls them the must be shown to him, and all ultimate views good commons-the worthy citizens of Ghent; must be concealed. and no longer gone than yesterday, made me, combinations, must be listed on our side him ours, if possible.' against our oppressors. We must teach them 'I will undertake unite them again. This Thibalt of Neuf- shall do so, without farther explanations; I châtel,' he added hastily, 'I have heard of give you good-night. him, and seen him often. When I was a the commons :- he is somewhat in his dotage well.' too, just at that point where weakness affects to show himself amongst us at some popular the night.

fold weaknesses, which we may employ to the fall of his order, if it were but for the purdetach some of their members from their own pose of saying to each ruined baron, "If you body, and to spread division amongst them. had done as I have, you would have been Is there no one who could be won?" At all events, he added, 'his pre-'None that I know of,' replied the druggist, sence with us would sow the first seed of dis-'except, indeed, it were my very good lord union among the proud nobility. Can no

'Oh, many, many, doubtless,' replied the popularity, bows his grey head to the people druggist; 'but great reverence and respect

'Of course,' answered Albert Maurice, 'of Walter Ganay, the poor burgher druggist, sit course, and resting his brow upon his hands, down at his lordly table, and drink of his he paused thoughtfully for several minutes. spiced wine. But I fear me, my dear young 'Mark me, good Master Ganay,' he said at friend, though the worthy lord may affect length,—'mark me, and remember that you wonderful popularity, and others of his rank have sought me in this business, not I you. might be brought to do the same, they would Think not, therefore, that in giving you direcnever stand by us in the moment of need; the tions what to do, I wish to arrogate to myself interests of their class would soon resume its any superior power, or wisdom, or knowledge. place in their thoughts, and they would quit Deeply and fervently do I wish to serve my the citizens whenever the citizens wanted their country. As far as I see my way clearly, and as far as my countrymen choose to trust me, 'That matters little,' replied Albert Mau-rice, laying his hand upon the arm of his com-panion. 'The aid that we might derive from fails, I will draw back and leave the staff in the swords of half-a-dozen nobles were but better hands. Let your first step, then, be, dust in the balance; but the advantages that at an early hour to-morrow-to prompt as we may derive from their seeming to be with many of the principal citizens as you can meet us in the outset are great and incalculable. with, to assemble in the town-hall upon various That which has overthrown the finest armies pretences. Speak to one about changes in the that were ever yet brought into the field; that price of grain, and send him thither to hear which has scattered to the wind the noblest more. Tell another that the English wools associations that ever were framed for the have failed, and let him come for news from benefit of mankind; that which has destroyed across the seas. Bid another to the town-hall leagues, and broken alliances, crushed re- for tidings from France; and a fourth for the publics under the feet of despots, and blasted news from Switzerland. I, too, will be there; the best formed and brightest designs of and if you can so arrange it as to bring Thibalt human beings, doubt and suspicion of each of Neufchâtel to the same place by half-past other;-that, that great marrer of all men's ten of the clock, I will have all prepared to fix

'I will undertake it,' replied the druggist. to fear and to suspect each other; and the 'Albert Maurice, we understand each other, bonds that hold them together will be broken, though little has been said, -and perhaps and may remain severed till it is too late to wisely;-yet we understand each other, and

'Farewell,' said Albert Maurice, as the mere boy, I remember riding under his escort other rose to depart; 'but remember, above from the Forest of Hannut, and as haughty a all things, no word to any one of this night's lord he was as e'er I met with; but now, it meeting; for, if we would work well towould seem, he has changed his tone, and is gether for the benefit of all, we must not the popular, the pleasant noble, the friend of be seen together too much. Again, fare-

Thus saying, he raised the light; and, after great wisdom. He must be won, by all guiding his visitor through some of the long means, if it be but for a day. Is there no and tortuous passages of his uncle's dwelling, way, think you, by which he may be brought he saw him depart, and closed the door for

CHAPTER XIIL

AN ARREST.

ONCE more within the solitude of his own rising and the hour appointed for the meeting chamber, Albert Maurice paused, while a in the town-hall; and, accompanied by worthy degree of emotion not to be mastered, passed Martin Fruse, whom he well knew that he over him, as he felt that he had taken the could rule as he liked, Albert Maurice profirst step in a career which must speedily ceeded into the streets of Ghent. bring power, and honour, and immortal glory, or the grave. As I have before said, in all vation of a horse's back, the young citizen the mutinous revolts of the citizens of Ghent, took his way on foot, followed, as well as prehe had recoiled from any participation in their ceded, by two serving men, to which the struggles, both with a degree of contempt for station of Martin Fruse, as syndic of the cloth. such petty broils as they usually were, and workers, gave him a right, without the impu with an involuntary feeling of awe, as if he tation of ostentation. It was not, indeed, the knew that whenever he did take a part in the custom of either of the two citizens to show strife, it was destined to become more deadly themselves in the streets of their own town and more general than it had ever been before, thus accompanied, except upon occasions of hension in his sensations. alone of a deep, overpowering feeling of the preceding day were true, sudden aid from mighty, tremendous importance of the events persons on whom they could rely, either as likely to ensue, of the awful responsibility combatants or messengers, might be required, incurred, of the fearful account to be given and he felt that that first step was irretriev- portant zeal of the serving men making way able, that his bark was launched upon the for the two high citizens whom they preceded. stormy ocean of political intrigue, that he had The streets, indeed, were all flutter and left the calm shore of private station never to gaiety; but the market-place itself offered a behold it again; and that nothing remained still more lively scene, being filled to overfor him but to sail out the voyage he had flowing with the population of the town and undertaken, amidst all the tempests and the the neighbouring districts, in all the gay and hurricanes that might attend his course. It glittering colours of their holiday costume. could scarcely be called a weakness to yield one short unseen moment to emotion under the principal traffic which seemed to be carrysuch a feeling; to look back with lingering ing on was that in news; and the buzz of regret upon the calm days behind; and to many voices all speaking together, announced strive with anxious thought to snatch some how many were eager to tell as well as to part of the mighty secrets of the future from hear. No sooner had the two citizens entered beyond the dark, mysterious veil which God, that flat, open square, which every one knows in his great mercy, has cast over the gloomy as the chief market-place of old Ghent, than sanctuary of fate. It was but for a moment the tall, graceful figure of the younger burgher that he thus yielded; and then, with a power caught the eyes of the people around; and in which some men of vast minds possess, he answer to a question from some one near, an cast from him the load of thought, prepared, artisan, who had come thither either to buy when the moment of action came, to act de- or sell, replied, 'It is Master Albert Maucisively; and feeling that his corporeal frame rice, the great merchant, just returned, required repose, he stretched himself upon they say, from Namur.' his bed, and slept without a dream-a sleep as deep, as still, as calm, as we may suppose another near; and the announcement of the to have visited the tent of Cæsar, when, con- popular citizen's presence ran like lightning scious of coming empire, he had passed the through the crowd. A whispering hum, and with a mind prepared for whatever fortunes the day might bring.

It was a market-day in the city of Ghent; fierce and excited people.

ber, woke him with energies refreshed, and more loud as it passed from mouth to

A few hours passed in writing, and a short explanation with his uncle in regard to the exigencies of the approaching moment, consumed the time between the young burgher's

In deference to his uncle's dislike to the ele-There was nothing, indeed, of personal appremunicipal state; but, in the present instance, hension in his sensations. They consisted both were aware that, if the news of the by him, who takes upon himself the dangerous and as they walked on, many a peasant, laden task of rousing up a nation, and attempts to with rural merchandise, was passed by them raise and rule the whirlwind passions of a in the streets, and many a group of gossiping men and women, blocking up the passage of He had now, however, taken the first step; the narrow ways, was disturbed by the im-

Although the market had already begun,

The words were immediately taken up by a movement of all the people, as he advanced, It lasted not long, however; and the first some to make way, and some to catch a rays of the morning sun, as they found their sight of him, was all that took place at first. way through the narrow lattice of his cham- But soon his name was given out louder and good friend of the people of Ghent!'

Doffing his bonnet, the young citizen advanced upon his way towards the town-hall, bowing on every side to the populace, with that bland yet somewhat stately smile upon his fine arching lip, which wins so much love without losing a tittle of respect; and still the people as he went cheered him with many voices, while every now and then some individuals would salute him in various modes, according to their rank and situation.

Give thee good day, Master Albert Maurice!' cried one who claimed some acquaintance with him.- God bless thee for a noble citizen!' exclaimed another .- 'Long life to Albert Maurice!' shouted a third .- 'What news from Namur?' demanded a fourth.-'Speak to us, noble sir!' again exclaimed another: 'speak to us! speak to us! as you

one day did on the bridge

Such cries were multiplying; and popular excitement, which is very easily changed into popular tumult, was proceeding to a higher point than Albert Maurice wished, especially as amongst the crowd he observed several These, though a word would have rendered them the objects of the people's fury, were much more likely to become the reporters of the public feeling to the government, before the preparations which he contemplated were mature; and he was accordingly hurrying his pace to avoid disturbance, when suddenly the sound of trumpets from the opposite side of the square diverted the attention of all parties.

The young citizen turned his eyes thitherward with the rest, and made his way forward in that direction, as soon as he perceived a dense but small body of armed horsemen debouching from the street that led from the palace, with trumpets sounding before them, and raised lances, as if their errand were as peaceful as their garb was warlike.

Apprehensive that something might occur which would require that rapid decision and presence of mind which rule, in many cases, even the greater ruler-circumstance, he hurried on, while the people made way for him father is well in health and stout in the field, to pass; probably from a tacit conviction that as is vouched by letters received last night by he alone from all the assemblage was qualified special couriers from his camp; and God and to deal with great events. As he approached, St. Andrew hold him well for ever! the body of horsemen reached the little fountain in the middle of the market-place, and he caught the flutter of female habiliments in the midst of the guard.

At that moment the squadron opened, and, clearing a small space around, displayed a mouth; and at length some one in the burgher; and from their presence he easily middle of the market-place threw up his cap divined the names and characters of the rest. into the air, and in a moment the place Mounted on a splendid black charger, there echoed with, 'Long live Albert Maurice, the appeared amongst others, the Lord of Ravenstein, first cousin of the Duke of Burgundy, together with the Duke of Clèves and the Lord of Imbercourt. The faces of these noblemen, as well as that of Margaret of York, Duchess of Burgundy, Albert Maurice knew full well: but in the midst of all was a countenance he had never beheld before. It was that of a fair, beautiful girl, of about twenty years of age, whose sweet hazel eyes, filled with mild and pensive light, and curtained by dark long lashes, expressed-if ever eyes were the mind's heralds-a heart, a soul, subdued by its own powers; full of deep feelings, calmed, but not lessened, by its own command over itself. All the other features were in harmony with those eyes, beautiful in themselves, but still more beautiful by the expression which they combined to produce; and the form, also, to which they belonged, instinct with grace and beauty, seemed framed by nature in her happiest mood to correspond with that fair face.

Albert Maurice needed not to be told that there, was Mary of Burgundy. He gazed on her without surprise; for he had ever heard that she was most beautiful; but, as he gazed, by an instinctive reverence for the loveliness he saw, he took his bonnet from his head, and, all the crowd following his example, stood bareheaded before her, while a short proclamation was read twice by a herald.

'Mary of Burgundy,' it ran, 'Governess of Flanders on behalf of her father, Charles Duke of Burgundy, to her dearly beloved citizens of Ghent. It having been industriously circulated by some persons, enemies to the state, that the high and mighty Prince our father Charles as aforesaid, Duke of Burgundy and Count of Flanders, Artois, and Hainault, had been slain in Switzerland, which God forefend! and knowing both the zeal and love of the good citizens of Ghent towards our father, and how much pain such evil tidings would occasion them, we hasten to assure them that such a rumour is entirely false and malicious; and that the Duke our

A loud cheer rose from all the people, while, bending her graceful head, and smiling sweetly on the crowd, the heiress of Burgundy acknowledged the shout, as if it had been brilliant group in the centre, on which all given in sincere congratulation on her father's eyes were instantly turned. A number of the safety. The princess and her attendants then personages of which it was composed were rode on, to witness the same proclamation in well known, at least by sight, to the young another place; but Albert Maurice stood gazing upon the fair sight as it passed away ing the ancient rule of her fathers? and he from his eyes, feeling that beauty and sweet- was forced to acknowledge, that it was beness, such as he there beheld, had claims to cause she was weak and young, a woman, rule far different from those of mere iron- and an orphan—and that was no very elevat-handed power. He was wakened from his ing reflection. Still farther, as he passed reverie, however, by some one pulling him by the cloak; and, turning round, he beheld the little druggist Ganay, who, with an air of as much bitter disappointment, anger, and surprise, as habitual command over his features would allow them to assume, looked up in the face of Albert Maurice, demanding, What is to be done now?

'Where is the Lord of Neufchâtel?' rejoined the young citizen, without directly an-

'Thank God, not yet arrived!' replied the 'Shall I go and stay him from druggist. coming?'

'No!' answered Albert Maurice thoughtfully. 'No, let him come; it were better that for exertion. he should, -now, fair uncle,' he continued, him through the crowd, and still stood beside him where the multitude had left them almost the mind of the druggist his conviction that profound reverence of demeanour delighted the farther prosecution of their purposes must not a little the old seneschal of Burgundy; be delayed for the time; and as they pro-ceeded towards the town-hall, Albert Mau-posed and discussed in his presence, and his rice, by a few brief words, which good Martin opinions were listened to and received with Fruse neither clearly understood nor sought universal approbation, the sense of conscious tached to their party. was deep and somewhat painful; and yet, he had once entertained, strange to say, the news that he had heard of It so luckily happene noble might be his motives, however great lusion to all topics of complaint and disconthe object he proposed—of breaking the tent. The little druggist Ganay spoke at sceptre which was to descend to her; and of length upon the subject; and, piquing himself anything but sweet. Thence, too, thought extraordinary expressions of joy on the ran on; and he asked himself, why was her good tidings that the princess had been reign the one to be marked out for overthrow- pleased to communicate, assured her of the

across the whole extent of the market-place once more, when the princess had just left it, he found all the busy tongues that had been lately vociferating his name now so occupied with the fresh topic, that he walked on almost without notice; and contempt for that evanescent thing popular favour did not tend to raise his spirits to a higher pitch.

He entered the town-hall then, gloomy; and though all the great traders present united to congratulate him on his safe return to Ghent, he remained thoughtful and sad, and could only throw off the reserve which had fallen upon him, when the arrival of the Lord of Neufchâtel gave him a strong motive

The other persons present received the speaking to Martin Fruse, who had followed noble baron, who condescended to visit their town-hall, with a degree of embarrassment which, though not perhaps unpleasing to him, alone,-'now, fair uncle, let us to the town- from the latent reverence that it seemed to hall, whither Master Ganay will accompany evince, was, at least inconvenient. But Alus. You, who are good speakers, had better bert Maurice, on the contrary, with calm conpropose an address of the city in answer to fidence in his own powers, and the innate digthe proclamation just made; and the good nity which that confidence bestows, met the Lord of Neufchâtel, who will be present, will nobleman with ease equal to his own; though doubtless look on and answer for your loyal without the slightest abatement of that formal dispositions. For my part, I shall keep si-respect, and all those terms of courteous ceremony, to which his station gave him a title, He spoke these words aloud, but with a and which the young citizen was anxious to peculiar emphasis, which easily conveyed to yield. This mixture of graceful ease with to understand, explained to the other the ne- superiority, satisfied pride, and gratified va-cessity of keeping the Lord of Neufchâtel at- nity, taught the worthy old lord to regard the good citizens of Ghent with feelings of plea-Albert Maurice then fell into silence which sure and affection, very different from those

It so luckily happened, also, that on this the Duke of Burgundy's safety, and the turn the first occasion of his mingling amongst the that the affairs had taken, was far from a discitizens, their proceedings were of such a appointment to him—it was a relief. The character as could not, in the least, comprovery sight of the princess had made him mise him with his fellow nobles. The matter thoughtful. To behold so fair, and seemingly discussed was merely a congratulatory address so gentle a creature, and to know that, as he to the princess, in answer to her proclamation, stood there before her, he bore within his setting forth nothing but loyalty and obediown bosom the design, the resolve-however ence, and carefully avoiding the slightest altearing from her hand the power she held rather than otherwise upon a degree of hypofrom her mighty ancestors, produced feelings critical art, he launched forth into high and Ghent, and even ventured upon a high and eye at that moment that was not to be enlaudatory picture of her father's character.

Albert Maurice stood by in silence; and though the druggist so far mistook his cha- but to do my duty, and I must do it.' racter as to imagine that the young citizen might admire the skill and dexterity with which he changed the purpose of their meeting, such was far from the case. While he listened, and suffered the other to proceed in a task with which he did not choose to meddle those of deep contempt; and he silently foot? marked all the words and actions of the other, workings of his dark and designing mind, which were still to come. Nor was the drug- can be brought to trial for your offences, gist alone the subject of his observation. Al- Albert Maurice deliberately unsheather sonal motive at the bottom of his heart.

the young citizen spoke but a few words, the Lieutenant of the Prévôt. tendency of which was to add to the congratu-Mary the petition that she would be the guardian and protectress of the liberties and privigrand staircase, and, the moment after, an armed head appeared above the rest; a second became very evident that a considerable band of soldiers were intruding themselves into a place sacred by immemorial usage from their presence. The citizens drew back as the troopers forced their way forward, and gradually, with many expressions of surprise and indignation, gathered round the spot where Albert Maurice had been speaking. With the young burgher himself indignation at the violation of the privileges of the city overcame every other feeling, and, starting forward before the rest of the burghers, he faced at once, with his hand upon his sword, the inferior officer who was leading forward the men-atarms, exclaiming, 'Back, back, upon your the building echo with its stern, determined loyalty and devotion of the good people of his command, for there was a lightning in his countered rashly. 'Sir,' said the Lieutenant of the Prévôt, for such he was, 'I come here

'And pray, sir, what duty,' demanded Albert Maurice, 'can afford you an excuse for violating the laws of your country and the privileges of the city of Ghent? Have you never heard by chance that this is our free town-hall, in which no soldier but a member himself, the feelings of Albert Maurice were of the burgher guard has a right to set his

'I come, sir,' replied the man, 'not so in order to read every trait of his character, much as a soldier as an officer of justice, in .nd to acquire a complete insight into the order to arrest you yourself, Albert Maurice, charged with high treason, and to lodge you which might be useful to him in the events as a prisoner in the castle till such time as you

Albert Maurice deliberately unsheathed his ways a keen inquisitor of the human heart, sword, a weapon which at that time the citi-Albert Maurice now watched more particu- zens of many of the great towns of Flanders larly than ever the conduct of the different in- and Brabant held it their peculiar right to fluential citizens, as persons with whom he wear. Others were instantly displayed around might hereafter have to act in circumstances him; and at the same moment the little drugof difficulty; but it was upon Ganay that his gist sprang up to the window, and, putting attention was principally fixed, both from a out his head, shouted forth, 'To arms, citifeeling that he would have to use him as a zens of Ghent, to arms!' which words the ears tool, or oppose him as an enemy, if ever those of those within might hear taken up instantly events occurred which he anticipated; and by those without; and the cry, well known in also from a belief that the other, in striving all the tumults of the city of 'Sta! sta! to hurry him forward, had some deep per- sta !--to arms ! to arms !' was heard echoing through the square below; while Albert Mau-During the whole course of the discussion rice replied slowly and deliberately to the

'Sir,' he said, 'whatever may be your molation of the citizens addressed to the Princess tive for coming here, and be the charge against me just or not, you have violated one of the privileges of the city, which never shall leges of the citizens of Ghent. While he was be violated with impunity in my person. I in the very act of speaking, there came a command you instantly to withdraw your clanging sound of a number of steps on the men; and perhaps, on such condition, you may receive pardon for your offence. As far as concerns myself, I appeal from your jurisfollowed, and then a number more; and it diction, and lay my cause before the Princess, to whom I am willing immediately to follow.

'That, sir, is utterly impossible,' replied the Lieutenant; 'nor will I consent to withdraw my men till I have executed the commission with which I am charged.'

'Then witness every one,' exclaimed Albert Maurice, 'that the consequences of his own deed be upon the head of this rash man.

The parties within the hall-of citizens on the one hand and soldiers on the other-were very equally matched in point of numbers, though the superior discipline and arms of the Prévôt's guard would, in all probability, have given them the advantage in the strife that seemed about to commence; but while each life!' in a voice that made the vaulted roof of body paused, with that natural reluctance which men always have to strike the first blow, the multiplying shouts and cries in the The officer did, indeed, take a step back at square before the town-house gave sufficient vôt's Lieutenant caught the sounds, and the former, pointing towards the open windows, exclaimed, 'Listen, and be warned!'

Do you, sir, really intend to resist the lawful authority of the Duke?' demanded the other, with evident symptoms of shaken resolution and wavering courage.

'Not in the least, sir,' replied Albert Mau-rice, calmly but firmly; 'nor do I desire to see blood flow, or tumult take place, though the cause be your own rash breach of the privileges of the city. I appeal my cause to the Princess herself; and you well know from

Prévôt, 'for she has gone forth but just now der yourself a prisoner till she returns.'

so; here all the chief citizens of Ghent will side of the hall. be surety for my appearance. Into hands I yield myself, but not into yours. Into their

the Lieutenant with perturbation of mind, evi-round before the Prévôt's band, and apdently increasing every moment as the shouts proached the crowd that obstructed their pasbecame louder without, and the noise of fre- sage out. 'My good friends,' he said, 'let quent feet in the stone vestibule below gave me entreat of you to keep peace, and let these notice that his position was growing every men depart quietly. Let us not risk our instant more and more dangerous. At that rights and privileges, and stain a just and noble moment, however, the old Lord of Neufchâtel cause, by any act of violence; let them go advanced to the side of the young citizen. forth in safety, and we here, your fellow-citi
Hark ye, Master Lieutenant, he said, 'to zens, will see that no breach of our rights take end all this affray, I, Thibalt of Neufchâtel, place. knight and noble, do pledge myself for the appearance of this young citizen, Master Al- two the leaders of the crowd remained in bert Maurice, to answer before the Princess silence, looking alternately at each other and get you gone, for this day have you committed here? a gross and shameful outrage against the privileges of these good people of Ghent; and I, officer, replied Albert Maurice, 'for the purold Thibalt of Neufchâtel, tell you so to your pose of arresting me. beard.

live the defender of the people of Ghent! Long live the gallant friend of the commons !' shouted a hundred voices at once, as the old 'Nay, nay,' exclaimed Albert Maurice, noble thus far committed himself in their raising his tone, 'it must not—it shall not be cause, and waved his hand for the Lieutenant of the Prévôt to retire.

Much would that officer have now given to have been able to do so without any prospect of annoyance; but, by this time, the two large entrances at the end of the hall were com- was not without its effect; and, after consider-

notice that an immense superiority of num- pletely blocked up by a dense crowd of traders bers would soon be cast upon the side of the and artisans, armed hastily with whatever citizens. Both Albert Maurice and the Pré- weapons they had been able to find, from partisans to weavers' beams. Beyond the doorways, again, the antechamber was completely filled by men of the same description; and from the number of voices shouting up and down the great staircase, it was clear that the whole town-house was thronged with the stirred up multitude. Those who had first reached the door had, with more moderation than might have been expected, paused in their advance as soon as they saw the parley that was going on between the citizens and the soldiers. But when the Lieutenant of the Prévôt turned round to effect his retreat, they the very name you have given the charge made no movement to give him way, and against me—that of treason—the eschevins of stood firm, with a sort of dogged determinamade no movement to give him way, and the city are incompetent to deal with the tion, which the slightest word from any one case. tion, which the slightest word from any one present would have changed in a moment 'Nay, but the Princess cannot hear your into actual violence. The officer paused as cause to-day,' replied the Lieutenant of the soon as he saw the attitude they had assumed, and eyed them with doubt not a little mingled towards Alost to publish the safety of my with fear. The citizens round Albert Maurice Lord the Duke; you must, therefore, surrenstood silent, as if undetermined how to act, and the grim faces of the crowd, worked by 'Nay, nay,' replied Albert Maurice, 'not many an angry passion, filled up the other

The resolution of Albert Maurice himself, however, was taken in a moment; and, ad-'I must have better bail than that,' answered vancing from amongst his friends, he passed

No one moved a step, and for a moment or the crime with which he is charged; and I at the young speaker, with an expression of become his bail in life and limb, lands and countenance which boded but little good to lordship, in all that I can become bound or the luckless band of the Prévôt. At length forfeit, to my Lord the Duke. And now, sir, one gruff voice demanded, 'What do they

'They came with orders from their superior

'Then they should die for their pains,' re-Long live the Lord of Neufchâtel! Long plied the same rough voice, which was supported by loud cries from behind of 'Down with them, down with them !'

so. Men of Ghent, for my honour, for your own; for the safety and privileges of the town, let them pass free. If ye love me,' he added, in a gentler voice.

This appeal to their feeling towards himself able persuasions and delays, he prevailed upon without abating one jot of that innate dignity them to withdraw from the antechamber and the staircase, and then, leading down the more or less affected his usual demeanour, Lieutenant himself, he conducted him and his succeeded, by showing all due reverence for men-at-arms through a lane of very ominous- the rank of his host, and expressing no small looking faces in the vestibule out into the gratitude for the liberal feeling he had dislace. Through the midst of these also, though history of his case, also, as it had occurred, and our conduct, and we demand no more.'

soldiers placed beyond the risk of all farther opposition, he returned to the town-hall, cunning astrologer, or sage, or politician that amidst the shouts of the people, who were can lay out, beforehand, the scheme of a now lingering to talk over the events that had single day? already occurred, and to see whether anything fresh might not arise to give them an opportunity of exercising the arms they held in their hands, and of satisfying the spirit that had been excited amongst them. On his arrival in the hall, he instantly approached the Lord of Neufchâtel, saving, 'Of course I can bring it about.'

'You seem to understand all these things. well as if you had been born to courts. Let us admit; and will immediately send to ascer- interest in the fate of Albert Maurice.

your cause.

and proud sense of mental greatness which great square, which was now thronged in al-most every part by bodies of the armed popu-upon the old officer's esteem. The whole not without considerable danger, Albert Mau- and the written testimony which he produced rice obtained a free passage for the Prévôt's to show the origin of his arrest by Maillotin band; nor did he leave them till he had seen du Bac, afforded a sufficient presumption of them clear of all obstruction. The Lieutenant his innocence to satisfy the old Lord of Neufhad remained completely silent during their châtel, who assured the young citizen of his passage through the crowd, except when personal protection and support before the called upon to give some command to his men council. Late in the evening a messenger concerning their array. When, however, from the palace announced that at noon the they were free from the people, he took the next day the Princess Mary would hear Albert hand of the young citizen in his and Maurice and his accusers; and shortly after wrung it hard. 'Master Albert Maurice,' he the old lord left him for the night, bidding said, 'you have acted a noble part, and it him amuse himself with a few books and shall be remembered when it may do you papers which he pointed out in the chamber assigned to him, and recommending him not 'Let it be remembered, sir,' replied the to think further of to-morrow, as his acquittal young citizen, 'to show that the people and was certain. Albert Maurice, willingly folburghers of Ghent, while they are determined lowing his advice, sat down to read; and the to maintain their rights with vigour, are sun soon after set to the young citizen, leaving equally determined not to maintain them with him in a position as different as it is possible violence. Do but justice, sir, to our motives to conceive, from that which he had contemplated the night before, as his probable situa-As soon as he had seen the little band of tion at the end of four-and-twenty hours.

And so it is through life! Where is the

CHAPTER XIV.

BEFORE THE PRINCESS.

consider myself as a prisoner in your hands, my DURING the course of the following morning lord, till such time as I can be heard in my Albert Maurice was visited, in the sort of own defence by the Princess and her council, honourable imprisonment to which he was which, I beseech you, may be as soon as you subjected, by all the chief citizens of Ghent; and a number of them begged permission of the ex-seneschal of Burgundy to accompany young gentleman,' replied the old noble, as their young townsman to the council-table of the palace. This was immediately granted to now go forth, then, to my lodging, where I will -Martin Fruse and several others, who, by reentertain you as well as my poor means will lationship or connection, could claim a near tain when the Princess will condescend to hear the same time the rumour of what was about to occur spread all over Ghent, and before This mode of proceeding was, of course, the arrival of the appointed hour, a large immediately adopted; and Albert Maurice crowd, composed of different classes, suraccompanied the Lord of Neufchâtel to his rounded the great gate of the dwelling of the dwelling, where, partly as a prisoner, partly Lord of Neufchâtel. At about half-past as a guest, he remained during the rest of the eleven, one of the young citizen's own horses day and the night that followed. The conduct was brought from his house to the place of of his entertainer towards him was a combi- his temporary abode; and, shortly after, the nation of stately hospitality and patronising old nobleman rode forth, accompanied by his superiority: and Albert Maurice himself, protégé, and followed by half-a-dozen of the principal burghers, while a party of about with their partisans crossed before the entrance twenty of his own armed attendants brought of the audience hall, raised their weapons at up the rear of the cavalcade. In this order, a signal from within. The doors were thrown and amongst deafening shouts from the people, who ran on by the sides of their confusion—for a number of persons had by considerable crowd was also assembled.

arms, clad in complete steel, with horses fur- at which were seated a body of the noblest called bard or bardo, while, in a double line drawn from each side of the council-board to from the entrance of the outer enclosure to the wall on either hand; and two soldiers the steps before the palace appeared a strong with drawn swords were placed within these body of harquebussiers, with their slow matches lighted, as if prepared for an anticipated struggle. Behind these, again, appeared the soldiers of the Prévôt's guard, who were chosen in general from those lighter and more active troops, which at a former period were called in the English armies hobblers, but which had now generally obtained the name of jennetaires, from the jennets or light Spanish horses on which they were usually mounted.

The Lord of Neufchâtel and his companions alighted at the outer gate, and passed on foot through the formidable military array above a bevy of fair girls, whose beauty, however, described. The old nobleman led the way, faded completely before her own. She was followed by Albert Maurice, who, with a firm step and an upright carriage, but without the slightest touch of bravado in his demeanour, passed along the whole line, which, he plainly saw, was drawn up to overawe any attempt to rescue him, that the populace might be inclined to make in case of his condemnation. The same demonstrations of military force appeared in the outer hall, and in an anteroom beyond, in which the young citizen and His eyes met hers for a moment, and the his companions were detained for a few colour rose slightly in her cheek as they did minutes, while his arrival was announced in so; while, at the same time, a thrill of feelthe chamber of audience with which it communicated.

It were vain to say that no shade of emotion passed through the bosom of Albert Maurice as he stood there waiting for an audience which was to determine his fate for life or death; but still his feelings were very different from those which men of less firm nerve might of their entrance, and the Lord of Neufchâtel be supposed to experience on such an occasion. Poor Martin Fruse, who stood behind he had become responsible, and claimed to be him, quivered in every limb with anxiety and delivered from the charge. The business of apprehension; fidgeted here and there, and the council then seemed suspended for a time. many a time and oft plucked his nephew by from some motive which Albert Maurice did the sleeve, to receive rather than to yield con- not understand. This was explained, howsolation and encouragement. The coun- ever, the minute after, when a door, which tenance of the young burgher, however, was entered within the bar, was thrown open, and in no way troubled: there was in it that expression of deep, grave thought, which befitted the time and circumstances; but his wrapped in innumerable bandages, was supbrow was unclouded, his cheek had lost not a ported into the hall by two attendants. that of its natural hue, and his lip quivered not eye of the Princess fixed upon him with an with anything like agitation.

horses, they proceeded to the palace, where a some means gained admission to the antechamber to witness the proceedings-Albert In the court-yard, so drawn up as to face Maurice, and those who accompanied him, the great gate, was a small body of men-at- were led forward to the end of a long table, nished with that sort of defensive armour men of the land. A wooden bar had been barriers, to prevent the spectators from advancing beyond them. The space thus left at the end of the hall being but small, was soon filled up, and the doors were immediately closed by the orders of the Lord of Imbercourt, who was sitting near the head of the table.

In the chair of state, which occupied the principal place in the hall, sat the same gentle, beautiful being whom Albert Maurice had seen the day before in the great square. She was dressed as befitted her state and station; and, in a semicircle behind her, stood faded completely before her own. She was somewhat paler than the day before, and perhaps a slight degree of agitation and anxiety might be visible in her looks; but still the predominant expression of her countenance was gentle calmness; and, as she raised the dark fringes of her soft hazel eyes towards the accused, when he took his place at the end of the table, they seemed to say, 'I shall be a ings, new and strange, passed through the heart of Albert Maurice. The principal places of the council-table were filled by the Lords of Ravestein, Imbercourt, Hugonet, and Vere; but the Duchess of Burgundy herself, the wife of Charles the Bold, was not present.

A momentary silence succeeded the bustle surrendered in due form the prisoner for whom Maillotin du Bac, his countenance as pale as ashes, his arm in a sling, and his head expression of grief and compassion, and After a brief pause, two soldiers, who stood making an eager gesture with her hand, she exclaimed, 'Place him a chair; place him a

This command was immediately obeyed; and after the Prévôt had paused for a few minutes to regain strength, he was directed to proceed with his charge against Albert little life that the good Green Riders have Maurice, qualified simply as a citizen of left thee with, and more—Ghent. This he instantly did with a loudness 'Peace, peace, sirs,' interof tone and a degree of vindictive vehemence, which no one could have supposed him which you stand, your own dignity, and the capable of exerting, from the weak state in which he appeared to be. His present charge châtel, do you object to tell the council what was somewhat differently couched from that you whispered but now in the ear of that which he had made against the young citizen young man?' at the castle of Hannut: he passed over in complete silence all the circumstances of the was just what I was about to tell you when prisoner's arrest, merely stating that he had received information of a treasonable commu- the fellow there, who has just sworn to having nication carried on by this young citizen read so much treason, must have learned to between Ghent, Namur, and France; and read very fast, and somewhat late in the day; that he had arrested him accordingly. On for not a year ago he was trumpeter in my his person he said he had found letters, the train, and could not tell an A from a Z. tendency of which placed the facts beyond doubt; and also showed that the prisoner was must be looked to. Some one hand him a criminally connected with those lawless bands book, -methinks thou turnest mighty pale, of routiers and plunderers called the Green he added, speaking to the trooper as his com-Riders. He then went on to detail his having mand was obeyed; and a volume of the arplaced him securely in one of the strongest chives of Burgundy was placed in the man's dungeons of the castle of Hannut, and of his hand. 'There, read me that sentence! having discovered the next morning that the dungeon was vacant. How it became so he book, gazing with a white face, and lackto swear upon his knightly oath, and two or attendants. three of his band, to whom he had shown those papers, were prepared to bear witness that they were of a most treasonable character.

To confirm this statement two of the troopers were accordingly called in, and swore to the Prévôt having shown them the papers found upon the prisoner's person, which were full of treason in every line.

During the evidence of one of these persons, the eye of Maillotin du Bac detected the old Lord of Neufchâtel in whispering something to the prisoner; and he exclaimed loudly and indecently against that nobleman for cogging, as he called it, with a base mechanical citizen and a traitor.

'Hark ye, Sir Maillotin du Bac,' replied the old lord, bursting forth with no small indignation; 'you yourself are a grovelling hound; and by the Lord that lives, the first time I meet thee I will drub out of thee the 'Peace, peace, sirs,' interrupted the Lord of Imbercourt; 'you forget the presence in solemnity of the occasion. My Lord of Neuf-

'Not I, in faith,' replied the other; 'that you interrupted me. I was then saying that

'Ha!' cried the Lord of Imbercourt, 'this

With trembling hands the man held the said he could not tell; but certain it was that lustre eyes, upon the characters which it conhe had not been received by the Lord of tained, and which were evidently to him mean-Hannut with that courtesy and willing co- ingless enough. After a moment's vain effort operation which, as an officer of the Duke of to perform the impossible task, he lifted his Burgundy, he had a right to expect. He eyes, and rolled them, full of dismay and denext detailed to the council his pursuit of the tected guilt, round the faces of all present; Green Riders; and related the manner in while Maillotin du Bac, in rage and diswhich he had been attacked and defeated, appointment, set his teeth firm in his pale although he rated the number of the brigands lip, and stamped his foot heavily upon the as not less than triple that of his own band. ground. The brow of the Chancellor Hugonet It was evidently their design, he said, and darkened; and, pointing to the man who had probably their whole design, to deprive him so evidently committed a gross and wilful perof the papers which proved the guilt of their jury, he exclaimed, 'Take him away, and let comrade and ally, who stood there at the end him be well guarded.' The command was of the table. In this view they had unfortu- immediately obeyed, and the trooper was nately been too successful; but he was ready hurried out of the chamber by two of the

'Do you not think, my lords,' said the low. sweet voice of Mary of Burgundy, 'that we may dismiss this cause? If it be supported by such witnesses as these, it will bring more disgrace upon our nation than can be well wiped off.

'We must not forget, madam,' replied Imbercourt, 'that here is justice to be done to the characters of two persons, the accused and his accuser; and though the nature of the testimony offered as yet, may well induce us to view this charge with suspicion, yet we should be doing less than justice to this young citizen of your good town of Ghent, did we not give him the opportunity of clearing his character fully from even a shade of doubt.

sternly, 'have you any other testimony to pro- horse-boy beaten and driven out of the town, duce in support of your accusation?'

'Methinks,' replied the Prévôt boldly,

'Not here, sir,' replied Imbercourt. 'You, young gentleman, he added, addressing the young burgher, 'you have heard the charge against you; do you desire to speak in your defence?'

'I pray thee, do so, young sir,' said the princess, bending slightly forward; - 'we would fain believe you wholly innocent, for we cannot believe that our noble father, the Duke Charles, can have done anything to turn one true heart against him; and we would fain hear that such a word as treason is unknown in the good land of Flanders, exas the man, who, but now, has been taken

Albert Maurice bent low his head, and then raising his eyes, he replied,- 'Madam, for your good opinion I would plead long; and, that I felt conscious of my innocence, and to tell you what were the contents of those able to establish it before you, you may, in letters, and of the honour and good faith of some degree, see, by the bold appeal I have those witnesses you have had an opportunity in the hands of one whose character is not also, with whose character you have equal famous for equal dealing. It seldom happens, means of being acquainted. My Lord of lady, that even in this evil world one man Imbercourt, to you I appeal. Those letters persecutes another without some motive, were shown to you in my presence; and if might weigh even against the fair character I world. trust I have hitherto borne, could I not prove, that, besides the general hate which he bears replied the Lord of Imbercourt, 'must not be towards the citizens of Ghent, he has a cause made in vain. I do most solemnly declare, of personal animosity against myself. The on my honour and oath as a belted knight, tale is soon told, and the proofs of its veracity that in the letters shewn me by the Prévôt, are in my hand, he added, laying his finger as found upon that young citizen's person, upon the papers, which he had collected to though there were some expressions bordering prove his innocence. Gembloux, whither I had gone, on business nothing, in my poor judgment, which any relating to the traffic of my house, I heard a sane man could construe into treason. woman's scream, and saw the wife of an honest burgher insulted and ill-treated at her eagerly upon the counsellor as he spoke; and own door by one of the brutal soldiers of that when he uttered the last words, a bright smile Prévôt's band ;-a band, lady, which, by their of gentle satisfaction lighted up all her feainsolent contempt of all the ordinary charities tures, while a slight glow, spreading over her and feelings of civil life, have brought more face, seemed to tell with what anxiety she had hatred upon the rulers of Flanders than ever listened to the testimony of the Lord of Im-your noble father dreamt of, and than ever bercourt. That smile and that glow were not their services against the brigands can repay. unmarked by Albert Maurice; and his own But no more on that score, he continued, as cheek flushed, and his own rich voice rather the Lord of Imbercourt held up his hand with trembled, as he proceeded with the next sena warning gesture. 'Suffice it, I saw a woman tences of his defence.
ill-treated by one of the soldiers of his band, 'On such grounds and I struck the miscreant to the earth in the continued, 'was I dragged along, tied hand very deed; and where is there a Christian and foot as a criminal of the worst description, man, be he knight or noble, citizen or peasant, who shall say that I did wrong? Before I was rest of the troop, while they attacked a part aware, however, I was seized and overpowered of routiers in the forest of Hannut-carried

Sir Maillotin du Bac,' he added somewhat by numbers, my arms tied with cords, my my baggage plundered, and several sealed letters which I was bearing from Namur to 'that my own word and testimony should be Ghent broken open, and read for the purpose of forging accusations against me.'

'You hear, lords, you hear!' exclaimed Maillotin du Bac; 'he acknowledges the fact of the letters, mark that.'

'Ay, do mark it, noble lords! mark it well,' continued Albert Maurice, boldly :-- 'I do acknowledge it. Nay, more, I acknowledge that in those letters was the expression of some grief and indignation felt by the people of Namur, on account of infringed rights and violated privileges. But, at the same time, I do most strictly deny, that I knew one word of the contents of those letters, till they were read by yon bad man in my presence; and still cept in the mouths of base calumniators, such more, I affirm, that even had I known everything that they contained, or had I written them myself, there was no sentence in them which tyranny itself could wrest into such a crime as treason. Lady, and you, Lords of the Council, yon Prévôt has called witnesses made to your justice, rather than trust myself of judging. I will now call upon a witness springing from either avarice, ambition, or re- you can, upon your knightly honour, declare venge; and you Prévôt's bare word, perhaps, that they contain treason, do so before the

'In the small town of upon turbulent discontent, yet there was

The eyes of Mary of Burgundy had fixed

'On such grounds of accusation, lady,' he -hurried forward in this situation with the on to the castle in that forest, and thrown was left the night before had been found into a dark dungeon, with a pile of straw for locked in the morning. No sign of violence my bed. I thence made my escape-

'How?' shouted the voice of Maillotin du

Bac-' how?'

' How matters not,' replied Albert Maurice. 'Ay, by my faith, but it does,' rejoined the Prévôt; 'for I accuse you, Sir Citizen, of leaguing with these forest swine that have so long plundered and desolated the land. Every one of my men can bear witness, that for the papers concerning you alone was I attacked near Braine-la-Leud; that they were the first things sought for when we were overpowered by numbers, and that the continual cry of their leaders was, - "Secure the papers."

Albert Maurice paused, and the Chancellor Hugonet, exclaimed .- 'You had better explain your escape, young gentleman; this gives a new aspect to the case.'

'On the facts that followed I can say something also,' observed the Lord of Imbercourt, 'having been in the castle of my good brother of Hannut when the absence of the prisoner was first discovered.

'Speak then, my lord, speak,' said Mary of Burgundy eagerly; 'such testimony as yours is beyond all question; and, unaccustomed to such scenes as this, I would fain see this case terminated speedily and well. Speak, then, my lord, and tell us all you know.

'It were better,' replied Imbercourt, 'and more in the forms of justice, to suffer the accused to tell his own tale, in regard to his escape; before I give any evidence that I can upon the subject. If you require it, sir,' he added, addressing the young citizen, 'I will absent myself from the council-table while you deliver your statement, that my testimony may be considered the more impartial.

'Not in the least, my lord,' replied Albert Maurice, 'do I desire your absence at all; nor is it my purpose to make any statement in regard to my escape. Escape I did. Of course I could not have done so effectually, without some aid, from without or from within; and I do not choose to injure any one, however lowly or however high, by implicating them in an affair like this. Whatever you know upon the subject must be from some other source, and, knowing my own innocence in every respect, I hear you without apprehension.'

I have, then, but little beyond conjecture to advance, 'said Imbercourt. 'On the morning after our arrival at the castle of Hannut, this Prévôt presented himself in great wrath before my noble brother-in-law and myself, informing us of the escape of the prisoner, and burgher during the course of yesterday morninsinuated, in somewhat insolent terms, that the Lord of Hannut-as loyal a nobleman as ever lived—had abetted the evasion. An in- only as a loyal subject to our lord the Duke, stant investigation was instituted, and we

was to be seen when we examined it in person, not a bar was broken, not a stanchion was moved: there, lay the straw which had been the prisoner's bed; there, stood the flagon and the bread which had been given him for his supper on the previous night. But, on inquiry, we found that this Prévôt, after some deep drinking, and, in a state, as several persons witnessed, of stupid drunkenness, had visited the prisoner's cell at a late hour the preceding night; and we concluded that he had suffered the young burgher to slip past him unobserved before he closed the door. Whether it was so or not, none but himself

'My lord, as I before said, I will be silent on that point,' replied Albert Maurice; 'but the use which I made of my liberty would be quite sufficient, I should conceive, to prove that I had no very evil or dangerous designs. I hastened immediately to Gembloux, where I obtained these papers, which I now lay before the council, to establish fully the fact that I was arrested, in the first instance, solely for striking a soldier, who had insulted the wife of a burgher of the place; I then made all speed to Ghent, where I was sure of encountering my adversary, but where I trusted also to obtain justice.

'And the first thing you did when you were in Ghent,' exclaimed Maillotin du Bac, with the angry vehemence of disappointed hatred, ' was to stir up the people to tumult, to make seditious speeches in the town-hall, to resist the lawful force sent to arrest you, and to incite the people to murder the officers that were despatched for your apprehension. Pretty proofs of innocence, indeed! Well, well, the Princess and the lords of the council will see what will come of it if they suffer such doings to take place with impunity. Who will serve the state, if the state will not support them in doing their duty? The strong hand, lords, the strong hand is the only way to keep down these turbulent, disaffected burghers.

'It must be the strong hand of justice, then. Prévôt,' replied Imbercourt; ' and let me tell you, that you yourself, by the unjust arrest of this young man, have done more to stir up the people to rebellion than the most seditious traitor that ever harangued from a market cross. Nor, sir, must you scatter such false and malicious accusations without proofs. Before I sat down here; I, with several of the other lords now present, investigated accurately what had been the conduct of this young ing; and I find that, so far from his behaviour being turbulent and seditious, he acted and was one of those good merchants who learned that the dungeon in which the prisoner drew up an address of congratulation on the that, had it not been for his influence and strong exertions with the people, your lieutenant and chants of the good town were assembled in government, and the existing institutions of deliberation. Nor can any one doubt the fact, for your own lieutenant was the first to bear witness to this young citizen's generous intercession in his favour.

Maillotin du Bac set his teeth hard, and stretched out his hand upon his knee with a sort of suppressed groan, which might proceed either from the pain of his bruises, or the disappointment of his malice. After a short defence, the Princess herself spoke, with that natural in one so young, so inexperienced, and so gentle on giving a decision upon so important a cause, although it was sufficiently evident to all what her decision must be.

'I think, my lords,' she said, 'after what we have heard, there cannot be any great difference of opinion. The evidence which has been brought forward seems not only to exculpate this young gentleman from all charge whatever, but to cast the highest honour upon his character and conduct. What say you, my lords? do you not acquit him freely from all stain?

The voices of the council were found unanimous in favour of the accused; and it was announced to him that he stood free and clear from all accusation. The Princess bowed to him, as his full acquittal was declared, with a smile of gratification at the result, which sprang from a pure, a noble, and a gentle young citizen a train of such apparently ab- private. struse thoughts. So, however, it was; and, as the doors of the audience-hall were thrown but, without pause, he followed the attendant, news of our sovereign's safety. More, I found open behind him, allowing those to go forth who had gained admittance to hear his examination before the council, he bowed to the Prinhis band, Sir Prévôt, would have been sacri- cess and the nobles present with feelings indificed to their indignation, for imprudently in- vidually more friendly to all of them, but certruding into a privileged place, while the ver- tainly more hostile to the general system of society.

Still Albert Maurice entertained no presumptuous dreams in regard to Mary of Burgundy. He thought her certainly the most beautiful creature he had ever beheld. She had smiled upon him sweetly and gently. She had been present at his examination herself, though she might, notwithstanding his appeal, have left it to the decision of her council. She pause, during which no one seemed prepared had done him full and impartial justice; and to say anything more, either in accusation or she had seemed to derive a personal pleasure from his acquittal. All this he felt strongly; sort of timid and doubtful tone which was and he was fond to picture from that fair face, and those soft hazel eyes, a mind and a spirit within all gentleness and excellence. He thought, too, that had mankind been in its just and natural situation, where no cold rules placed as wide a distance between different classes, as if they were composed of different creatures, he might have striven to win,-ay, and he thought he might have won, that fair hand, which had held the scales of justice for him so impartially.

Such feelings, and all the many collateral thoughts to which those feelings gave rise, were busy in his breast, as he followed the good old Lord of Neufchâtel towards the door. Just as he was going out, he turned to take one more glance of the Princess,-the last, perhaps, he was ever to obtain; but Mary of Burgundy and her ladies had already quitted the hall, as well as his accuser, Maillotin du Bac, who had hastened away to conceal himheart, pleased to see a fellow-creature, whose self from popular indignation. Nothing was dignified deportment and graceful carriage to be seen but one or two of the members of could not but win upon the weaknesses of the council, standing together in a group at human nature, establish clearly a higher and the farther end of the table, and apparently, by more dignified title to standard the farther end of the table, and apparently, by more dignified title to esteem by tried virtue the gay laughter in which they were inquigand integrity. There was no other feeling ing, conversing over some indifferent subject. Mingled with her smile; nor did Albert Maurice turned, and strode through rice for a moment dream that there was; but, atthesametime, it wakened a train of thoughts in his own mind both dangerous and painful. More than ever did he feel that he was born law to good Martin Fruse, who listened to his out of the station for which pature had formed. out of the station for which nature had formed speech with every mark of the most deferenhis spirit; and more than ever did his heart tial respect. The young citizen was just burn to do away those grades in society which, entering the outer hall, and he already heard though the inevitable consequences of the inate differences between different men, he, from mortified pride, termed artificial distinctions, and unjust barriers betwixt man and pearance, when somebody plucked him by the man. It were to inquire too curiously ners. sleeve, and one of the officers of the household. It were to inquire too curiously, per- sleeve, and one of the officers of the household haps, to investigate how the one sweet smile informed him, in a low tone, that the Princess of that beautiful lip woke in the heart of the Mary required his presence for a moment in as he turned away from him, and in a mo- vision faded, and left him but the cold and into the private apartments of the palace.

The heart of the young burgher beat quick;

CHAPTER XV.

ALBERT'S INTERVIEW WITH THE PRINCESS.

withdrawn for ever from their sight.

man, when the spirit, excited by some great bent, seemed, with all due reverence, to give and stirring passion, or by mingling with her counsel upon some private matter of immighty and portentous events, seems to gain portance. Another figure was retiring from for a brief instant a confused but magnificent an opposite door as Albert Maurice entered; view of splendid things not yet in being. Im- but who it was, the faint glance he caught did agination in the one case, and hope in the not permit the young burgher to distinguish. other, give form and distinctness to the airy images, though both are too soon doomed to Princess stood, with the usual marks of cerestern world we dwell in.

The mind of Albert Maurice had been ex- him to kiss, with a gentle smile, but with the cited by the scenes he had just gone through; air and demeanour of a princess. and success, without making him arrogant, battles and victories, and triumphant success, council. the shout of nations and of worlds, the sceptre, the palace, and the throne, with a thousand impartial a judge, madam,' replied the young indistinct ideas of mighty things, danced citizen, 'it were happy for the world; and, before his eyes for a moment, with a sweeter indeed, it was my full confidence in your own and a brighter image, too, as the object and justice, and in that of the noble lords of the end of ambition, the reward of mighty en-council, which made me appeal so boldly to deavour, the crowning boon of infinite success. your own decision. But still he felt and knew, even while he dreamed, that it was all unreal; and as he Princess; 'and I have now sent for you to followed the messenger with a quick pace the say so, as well as to speak with you on one ment had passed through one of the side doors naked truth. At length, after passing through several chambers, which flanked the hall of audience, the door of a small apartment, called the bower, was thrown open, and the young burgher stood once more before Mary of Burgundy.

One of the most painful curses of high sta-EVERY one knows that in the early dawn of a tion is that of seldom, if ever, being alone; of Sicilian morning, the shepherds and the watch- having no moment, except those intended for ers on the coast of the Messinese Strait will repose, in which to commune with one's own sometimes behold, in the midst of the clear heart, without the oppression of some human unclouded blue of the sky, a splendid but de- eye watching the emotions of the mind as lusive pageant, which is seen also, though in they act upon the body, and keeping sentinel a less vivid form, amongst the Hebrides. over the heart's index—the face. Mary of Towers and castles, domes and palaces, fes- Burgundy was not alone, though as much tivals and processions, arrayed armies and alone as those of her station usually are: she contending hosts, pass, for a few minutes, in stood near a window, at the other side of the brilliant confusion before the eyes of the be- apartment, with her soft rounded arm and holders, and then fade away, as if the scenes delicate hand twined in those of one of her fair of another world were, for some especial pur- attendants-Alice of Imbercourt-on whom pose, conjured up for a moment, and then she leaned slightly, while the Lord of Imbercourt himself stood beside her on the other Thus there are at times, too, in the life of hand; and, with his stately head somewhat

He advanced towards the spot where the fade away amidst the colder realities of the mony and reverence; and, as he came near and bent one knee, she held out her hand for

'I congratulate you, Master Albert Maurice," had filled him full of hope. Each step that he she said, as soon as he had risen, 'on the took forward seemed but to raise him higher, clear and satisfactory manner in which you and each effort of an enemy to crush him have been able to establish your innocence; seemed, without any exertion of his own, but for I fear that it sometimes happens that to clear the way before him. Such thoughts persons accused are not able to bring forward were mingling with other feelings-brought sufficient evidence to exculpate them before forth by the sight, and the voice, and the their princes, who, judging according to their smile of Mary of Burgundy, when the sudden best conscience, are often charged with cruelty call to her presence woke him from such or partiality, more from defect of the testimony dreams; but woke him only to show to his offered to them, than from any desire of doing mind's eye a thousand confused but bright and aught but justice. I therefore congratulate splendid images, as gay, as glittering, as page- you most sincerely on your having had the ant-like, but as unreal also, as the airy vision means of establishing your innocence beyond which hangs in the morning light over the all doubt: and I am deeply gratified myself, Sicilian seas. Fancy at once called up every that you have been able to remove every doubt thing within the wide range of possibility— from my own mind, as well as to satisfy my

'Had every person accused, so gracious and

'For so doing I thank you, sir,' replied the part of your defence, which somewhat touched some service rendered, which may merit upon the honour of my father's justice. Al- reward and confidence. though I marked it at the time, I did not She paused, as if for faithful friends, I seek this private mode—to swerve from the truths indelibly written in certainly not of chiding you for what has passed your lips—but of calling to your reor lower himself in the esteem, of one whose membrance things which might have made good opinion had become, he knew not why, your words less bitter.

ing slightly, with some degree of agitation, from the task thus imposed upon her, and and sentiments of her rank and of her times; from the long time which it required her to speak upon subjects of some political importance. She showed, indeed, no awkward incompetance, no want, of mental power; but and powerful. her blush and her slight embarrassment were cate and feeling mind. While she paused, Albert Maurice merely bowed his head, without reply; and in a moment after, she

'I am very young, sir,' she said, 'and, as the study of the laws and institutions, nor of trod the earth would not have caused it to the history, of the dominions that may one quail for an instant. day become my own. In speaking of the city certain penalty as the consequence. That just in the same proportion that the man is to penalty has always been the loss of some of be blest, who teaches a people to improve their privileges; which punishment has uniformly been received by them as most merciand to extend their knowledge and resources, ful, at the time when detected treason or —in the same degree is he to be hated and suppressed revolt brought upon them the despised, who teaches them to be discontented wrath, and placed them at the mercy, of a with their condition. powerful prince. Nor, let me say, can they hope to regain the privileges they have lost, with more calm firmness than he could, perexcept by a calm and tranquil obedience, or haps, have shown, had he answered the Prin-

She paused, as if for reply; but Albert choose to notice it before the many; and now, Maurice remained silent. In truth, he felt no by the advice of one of my best and most small difficulty in so shaping his answer as not of more consequence in his eyes than mortal The Princess paused for a moment, colour- opinion had ever been before. He felt, too, that the Princess spoke according to the ideas while he himself bore within his bosom the feelings of his own class, and the thoughts of times long gone, when liberty was eloquent

Although between such different principles those of her youth, of her sex, and of a deli- there was a gulf as deep as the abyss, still love might span it with a bridge, which, like that that leads to the Moslem paradise, is finer than a famished spider's thread. But it were wrong to say he loved. Oh, no! he would have shrunk from so idle a thought, had it a woman, am of course cut off from mingling come upon him in a tangible shape. Yet there greatly with mankind. Nevertheless, as it was something growing upon his heart which has so unfortunately fallen out, that the rule softened it towards Mary of Burgundy—which of these territories should seem to be at some rendered it unwilling to hurt her feelingstime destined for a female hand, and that which made it timid of offending her, though hand mine, I have not, of course, neglected the eye of the proudest sovereign that ever

The Lord of Imbercourt saw more clearly of Namur, you named rights violated, and into the character of the man, and knew more privileges infringed, and, perhaps, alluded to of the circumstances of the times, than the some other privileges of which other towns Princess he had stayed to counsel; and, perhave been deprived. Most of the events that ceiving that the young citizen was not about you probably referred to, took place before to reply, he spoke a few words in addition to the period to which my own remembrance that which Mary had advanced, taking a extends; but, if the historians of the land say wider ground than she had assumed, and extrue, no rights were ever, in any instance, arbianining the subject more as a philosopher trarily wrenched away from the people. In than either a feudal noble, or the counsellor of all cases, if my memory serve me right, the an absolute prince. He spoke of the neces-loss of privileges was inflicted on the citizens sity of order and good government, for the as a punishment for some crime, for some un-peace and happiness of the people themselves; provoked revolt, for some attempt to snatch he pointed out that tranquillity and general the power from what they considered a weak confidence were absolutely necessary to indusor embarrassed hand. Such being the case, try, both commercial and productive; and he justice—both in the abstract sense of award-showed, with the voice of years and experiing punishment for evil, or in the moral policy ence, that turbulence and discontent were of deterring others from crime, by the exruinous to any nation, but in a tenfold degree ample of retributive infliction—required that ruinous to a commercial people. 'Believe the cities which had so acted should suffer a me, Master Albert Maurice,' he added, 'that cess,-' I will not, my Lord, attempt to use afford.

He paused; and Albert Maurice replied

every nerve more feeble and relaxed there- as his might bestow. after. No, no: administer good plain and is best adapted to its state.

point of resemblance between the young citi- from no lips but yours, I pray you communizen and the high-born noble—namely, the fine cate it to him yourself. aspirations and elegant feelings which raised examining than I can have had,

'I am, of course, incompetent, my Lord,'

Imbercourt watched his countenance during towards you that ordinary fallacy which, in this brief reply: and he was too much versed fact, arises only in the imperfection of lan-guage, namely, that people must be rendered discontented with their condition, in order to that the high and flashing spirit, the keen and gain the desire of changing it. I know and acute mind which the young burgher had feel, that, though we have not a word exactly displayed at the examination before the counto express it, there is an immense difference cil—and which, indeed, had been reported between discontent with our present state, and long before to the ministers of the Duke of the calm desire of improving it. But still, it Burgundy-was curbed and restrained on may be doubted whether the mind of man, the present occasion; and he easily divined especially in multitudes, does not require some of the motives which created such remore universal and potent stimulus to carry it serve. He saw, too, that it would be necesgenerally forward to great improvements, than sary to make use of other inducements than the slow progress of increasing knowledge can those of argument for the purpose of detaching the young citizen from the factious party 'No, no, indeed,' replied Imbercourt; 'the in Flanders, and of preventing him from givpotent stimulus is like too much wine, that ing to their designs, the consolidation, the only maddens for the time, and then leaves direction, and the vigour which such a mind

Neither had the slight shade of emotion wholesome food to the social as well as to the which had passed over the countenance of human body; and, growing in strength and Albert Maurice, when addressed by the Prinperforming all its functions correctly, it will cess, escaped his experienced eye; and, gain, by the same calm and easy degrees, the though far too proud and aristocratic in his desire and the power of obtaining that which own nature ever to dream that a burgher of Ghent could indulge in the very thought of Albert Maurice felt that there was truth in love towards the heiress of the land, he was what the Lord of Imbercourt advanced; but, sufficiently chivalrous in his own mind to benevertheless, between them there still existed lieve, that a smile from such fair lips, a word a thousand differences of opinion, which would from so sweet a voice, might bend a man on have required an infinite change of circum- whom arguments would prove all useless. He stances to have removed. The differences of turned, therefore, to the Princess, with a smile, their age, of their station, of their education, saying,— Well, let us not reason of the past; and of their habits, were all as much opposed I think, madam, that you had something to to a coincidence of thought, as the difference say to this young gentleman concerning the of their natural characters itself; and the only future; and, as it could come with full effect

'Most willingly will I do so,' replied Mary the former above the generality of his class— of Burgundy; and I am sure that I shall not naturally tended to make him detest those speak in vain. I have heard, and, indeed, I laws of society which held him down in a rank know, Master Albert Maurice, that no man in below that for which he was fitted, and look the good city of Ghent possesses so much with disgust upon those who maintained them influence as yourself with the merchants and as a barrier against him. At the same time people of the good towns. My father being he was conscious that in his bosom there now absent and likely, I fear, to remain so might be some feelings not entirely patriotic, for some time, as my dear and excellent or, at least, he felt afraid that it was so; and stepdame, Margaret his Duchess, has been perceiving, also, that the arguments which called to join him at Dijon—and the govern-were addressed to him, were far more liberal ment of Flanders resting in my weak hands. and plausible than those usually held by the I am anxious, most anxious, to preserve the class to which the Lord of Imbercourt be- country, and especially this city of Ghent-longed; he did not choose to enter into a which, she added with a smile, 'has not in farther discussion, which might either shake all times been famous for its orderly disposiwhich he acted to those who would take means to foil his designs.

This own determinations, or expose the views on which he acted to those who would take means to foil his designs.

This own determinations, or expose the views on which his own determinations, or expose the views on the control of the cont that you will use your best endeavours to still he replied, 'to argue with an experienced all irritation, to calm all disposition to fumult, statesman like yourself, on subjects which you and to maintain in the people a spirit of must have had a much greater opportunity of order and quiet. Maw I knust that you will do so ?'

young citizen with fearful force; and the pain as he had done, those who had accompanied that he experienced for a few moments, till him to the council chamber, the moment that he had determined upon his reply, would be the examination was over. The mind of Aldifficult to describe. At length he answered, though with some hesitation.

under your sway, however long the government of Flanders may be delegated to you by your father, no infraction of the people's rights, no blow at the privileges of the good with more energy and feeling, expressed his towns, will, or can take place. Under this gratitude for the kindness and services which towns, will, or can take place. Under this gratitude for the kindness and services who conviction, I will willingly promise what you demand, though, in truth, you attribute to me 'Well, well, no more of that I' cried the much greater influence than I possess. At the same time, madam, let me pray you to remember, that if-which God forbid !-evil ministers or tyrannical officers should, as sometimes happens, wrong their master, by trampling on his subjects, I cannot, and I will not, bind myself to support such things, or to

God forbid, indeed,' exclaimed Mary eagerly, 'that you should ever be put to such a trial! Indeed, young gentleman, indeed,' she added, with her whole beautiful countenance glowing with enthusiasm, 'to merit and to win my people's love, to heal all feuds, to bind up every wound, to wipe the eyes that weep, to raise up the oppressed, to uphold queen of one half the world.

Madam, I believe it !- from my heart I believe it !' replied Albert Maurice, catching the enthusiasm of her tone; 'and may God

As he spoke, he felt that the presence of that fair being had become more dangerous to his resolutions and purposes, perhaps even to his peace, than he could have imagined possible; and, afraid that at every word he might promise more than circumstances might permit him to perform, or bind himself so strictly, that his duty to his country would be lost,-he paused, and drew a step back, in order to take his leave. The princess saw the movement, and bowed her head, to signify that he was at liberty to depart. 'Farewell, sir,' she said; 'and do not forget the promise you have made.'

The young citizen bowed, and retired; and while Mary remained in deep and anxious conversation with Imbercourt, he made his way back to the antechamber of the audiencehall, which was now empty, and thence into the autumn, as a memorial of the warmer seathe court of the palace, where he was joined son gone before. The sky was all full of light, by his uncle, Martin Fruse; and found the and the air full of heat; and the grand masses Lord of Neufchâtel in the act of mounting his of high grey clouds that occasionally floated horse. The old nobleman paused for a mo- over the sun were hailed gladly for their soft ment, to read the young citizen a long and cool shadow, although the day was the

The blood rushed up to the temples of the stately lecture upon the impropriety of leaving, bert Maurice, however, and his heart, were busied about far other things; and the reproof 'Madam,' he said, 'I feel assured that, of the old cavalier fell upon a somewhat dull and inattentive ear. He answered with some formal words of apology, stating that he had been called away unexpectedly; and then,

'Well, well, no more of that !' cried the old Lord; 'never shall it be said that I shrunk from the side of an oppressed man, be he noble or not noble. Happy I am that you have so fully cleared yourself, Master Albert Maurice; and whenever the good citizens of Ghent require such aid and advice concerning oppose my countrymen in seeking to right old acquaintance with courts and camps, can themselves.' matters of state and feudal law, as I, from my give, let them come freely to consult me, without fear or bashfulness; that is to say, while I am in the city; for, in ten days' time, I go to join the camp, and once more, though the hand be feeble, and the head be grey, to lay lance in rest for Burgundy. However, absent or present, I shall always be happy to do what I can for the good city of Ghent.

Albert Maurice bowed, and his uncle bowed and to promote the virtuous, and to guard the low; and, mounting his horse, though with feeble and defenceless, would be the first wish somewhat less alacrity than he had done and thought of Mary of Burgundy, were she in his youthful days, the Lord of Neufchâtel quitted the palace court, and went bowing and nodding through the crowds assembled without. Albert Maurice and his uncle then followed, through the grim lanes of soldiery that bless and prosper you in the performance of still occupied the interior of the square. The so noble an intention!' appearance of the young citizen, after his exculpation, was instantly hailed by the multitudes without, as a sort of popular triumph; and, amidst shouts of joy and congratulation, he was conducted safely to his own dwelling.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE STORM IN THE FOREST.

WE must now carry the reader's mind forward to a day a little in advance of that which we last noticed.

It was towards that period of the year which the French call the short summer of St. Martin, from the fact of a few lingering bright days of sunshiny sweetness breaking in upon eleventh of November. Sweeping over the which, unhappily, in after years, led to that prospect, like the mighty but indistinct images fatal accident which deprived the world of of great things and splendid purposes that one of its brightest ornaments. By her side sometimes cross a powerful but imaginative mind, the shadows of the clouds moved slowly over hill and dale, field and forest. Now they cast large masses of the woods into dark and gloomy shade, and left the rising grounds around to stand forth in light and sparkling brightness, giving no bad image of the dark memories that are in every heart, surrounded but not effaced by after joys. Now they floated soft upon the mountains, spreading an airy purple over each dell and cavity; while, pouring into the midst of the valley, the bright orb of day lighted up tower, and town, and farm, and hamlet, and village spire, as hope lights up the existence of man, even while the many clouds of fate hang their heaviest shadows on the prospect round about him. The harmonious hue of autumn, too, was over all the world. Russet was the livery of the year; and the brown fields, preparing for the sower, offered only a deeper hue of the same colour, which, though varied through a thousand shades, still painted every tree throughout the woods, and sobered down even the grassy meadows with a tint far different from that of spring. The sky, with the sunshine that it contained, was all summer; but the aspect of everything that it looked upon spoke of autumn sinking fast into the arms of winter.

Such was the scene upon the banks of the little river Geete, when a party, whose bright dresses and active movements spoke sport and gaiety, rode up the windings of the river, not far from the place where now stands the little hamlet of Sodoigne. No village, however, stood there then; and the banks of the stream and, if it reached the bounds of cheerfulness, were bordered for some miles with green it seldom went beyond. meadows, not above two or three hundred bounded to the eastward by the forest of Hannut, which swept in irregular masses along the whole course of the river, and was conbanks of the watercourse, sometimes, in the steepest part, lined with bushes, which dipped their very branches in the current, but more often-where the turf and the stream were nearly upon a level-fringed with long green flags and other water-plants.

The party who cantered lightly along the meadows consisted of eight persons, of whom three were females; and each of the latter upon her hand bore the glove and falcon, which showed the object of their expedition. The first in state, in loveliness, and in grace, was Mary of Burgundy, mounted on a beausiful white horse, adorned with many a goodly trapping, and which, though full of fire and life, she managed with that easy and graceful horsemanship for which she was famous, and rode the fair Alice of Imbercourt, her favourite friend and nearest attendant; while another young lady, of inferior rank, but still of noble birth, followed a step behind, somewhat embarrassed by the high spirit of her horse, which she managed well, but with less dexterity than the other two. An elderly gentle-man, of mild, complacent, and courtly manners, followed the ladies as their principal attendant; while, of the other four, two habited in green, and furnished with long poles for beating the bushes, together with lures, spare jesses, hoods, and bells, at once showed themselves as official falconers; and the two who brought up the rear, though armed with a degree of precaution that was very necessary in that day, appeared what they really were, namely, simple grooms.

There is something in the excitement of quick riding totally obnoxious to both fear and sadness. It is scarcely possible to conceive a person galloping easily along upon a spirited horse, without feeling his confidence and hope renewed, in some degree, whatever may be the circumstances of his situation. Thus, though in the heart of Mary of Burgundy there was many a memory of painful feelings, of disappointed hopes, and crushed affections; and, though across her mind, whenever she suffered it to rest upon the future, would come dark and painful apprehensions,-still the excitement of the sport, the beauty of the day, and the glow of exercise, had given to her heart a flow of high spirits that she had not known for many a day. Her mirth, indeed, was never overpowering,

Now, however, as they rode along by the yards in breadth. This rich pasture was banks of the stream, and as the falconers beat the bushes to rouse the objects of their chase, she jested in a tone of gentle gaiety with the fair girl who accompanied her upon all those fined on the other hand by the low but broken matters which, to the heart of woman, are the important things of life.

Alice of Imbercourt, on her part, maintained the conversation with the same spirit, jested, with like good-humoured malice, with the Princess, and was never without an answer at her need, although she did not for a moment forget that, however high her own rank, Mary of Burgundy held a higher, nor ever failed to mingle with her speech so much of reverence as to show that she had not forgot the distinction.

'Nay, nay, own, dear Alice, 'exclaimed the Princess, in reply to something that had passed before, that day by day you have was a leaf in the book of fortune, or, rather, tain castle in the wood; and, in truth, I think to read for yourself. But tell me, Alice,' she father to be a confederate in your plot.

* She died a few years after this period, in consequence of a fall occasioned by her horse taking fright, while out falconing.

happy thing were it for us poor women if all about him, and you, of course, must know fathers were so complacent: I know well where one little heart would be in that case;'

face of the Princess.

However strongly prudence may enjoin them to be silent themselves, all women feel more reason, of all others, why I should know less or less pleasure when the conversation is of him than any other person. brought near the subject of their loves. Though Mary of Burgundy would not herself look of surprise. say one word that she could help, upon the freely.

'Nay, nay, Alice,' she exclaimed, 'that was an artful turn, my sweet friend; but you shall not escape so readily. Tell me, did you not put it in your father's head, to think what a fine thing it would be for me to visit all the different towns in Flanders, and win the love hand is your own, and your will is free. See of the good burghers? And did you not yourself lay out the very plan of our journey from Ghent to Alost, and thence to Brussels, and thence to Louvaine, and thence to Tirlemont? And have you not kept me three full days at Tirlemont; and, at last, have you not brought me up the fair river Geete, with our hawks upon our hands, and nobody to watch us, till we are within a league or two of this same castle of Hannut?—Fie, Alice, fie! it is a decided conspiracy!'

Alice laughed gaily, and replied, 'Well, lady, if it can be proved, even by the best logic of your pretty lips, that I do wish to see my lover, I know no woman, that has one, who does not do so too, from the farmer's milkmaid, with the pail upon head, to the Princess of Burgundy, on her white Spanish jennet.

Mary laughed and sighed. 'You own it, then,' she answered: 'I thought, when last night you were striving hard to persuade me to visit the castle of Hannut, and have my future fate laid bare by the dark and awful skill of this learned uncle of yours, that there strain, - and is as handsome a man, and as

been bringing me nearer and nearer to a cer- in the book of life, that you would well like that you must have got the good lord your added, more seriously, 'tell me something more of this lover, to whom, it seems, you 'Good sooth, dear lady,' replied Alice, 'a are affianced. There appears some mystery more of him than any one else.'

'Nay, quite the contrary, my dear lady and and she looked up with an arch smile in the mistress, replied Alice of Imbercourt; 'that shows how little you know of the sad race called men. His being my lover is the very

' How so?' demanded the Princess, with a

'Why, simply because, from the moment feelings of her own heart, even to so dear and he becomes my lover,' replied Alice of Imfaithful a friend as Alice of Imbercourt, yet bercourt, 'he takes the very best possible care she felt no displeasure when the gay girl's to hide every evil quality in his nature and tongue touched upon the subject of her affecdisposition, upon the full and preconcerted tions, although clouds and darkness hung plan of not letting me see any of them till over the prospect, and all hope of their grati- such time as he is my husband; then, out fication was but faint indeed. At the same they come! But that is not all, 'she continued; time she was, perhaps, a little fearful of the 'that would only hide a part of his character; topic ever being carried too far, and, there- but, at the same time that he takes these prefore, after a smile, in which melancholy cautions, I, on my part, like every wise woman, mingled, in some degree, with pleasure, she make up my mind, on no account whatever to returned to her own jest with her fair follower, see any little fault or failing that he may acciwithout adding one word more to a subject dentally display—at least, till such time as he on which both, in happier circumstances, is my husband. Then, of course, when nomight have been well pleased to speak more thing more is to be gained or lost, I shall, beyond doubt, take as much pains to find them out as another, and he will take as little to

'That is a bad plan, Alice,' replied the Princess, 'that is a bad plan; find out the faults, if you can, in the lover, while your them not at all in your husband; for blindness in such a case is woman's best policy. But you mistake me, Alice; it was not of his mind I spoke, but of his situation; for, when questioning my Lord of Imbercourt, the other day, he called him your uncle's nephew: now, none of our wise heralds ever heard, it seems,

of such a nephew.'

A slight blush came up into the cheek of Alice as the Princess spoke; but she replied frankly, 'In truth, dear lady, I know nothing on that score; and upon such subjects I have even thought that if my father was satisfied, I had no reason to complain. All I know is, that my cousin Hugh was brought up at the court of France, -has fought in the civil wars of England, and under Galeas, Duke of Milan, -has gained honour, and knighthood, and glory in the field,-is gentle, and kind, and tender, and affectionate to me; and is-' she added, with a laugh and a blush at the praises which she was pouring forth, and which she felt must betray the whole secret of her heart, but which yet she could not or would not re-mounted horse.

The Princess smiled and answered, 'Well, well, if he be all that, fair Alice, you are right -quite right-to ask no farther questions. But how is it, good Bartholomew,' she cried, this fair stream, for us to fly our hawks?

'So please your Grace,' replied the man, 'the air is so sultry that the herons will hardly wade where there is no shelter; but up beyond those bushes, where the bank with its long sedges jets out into the stream, I doubt not we may raise something yet.'

The whole party accordingly rode on; and the judgment of the experienced falconer was found quite right. Under the cool shadow of the bank, one of the feathered fishermen had advanced some way, with his long legs, and, taking fright at the noise of the horses, he stretched forth his neck, gathered the air under his wings, and soared, up at about the distance of twenty or thirty yards from the approaching party. The birds were instantly cast from the wrists of the ladies: the heron, finding himself pursued, and apparently a crafty old bird, strove to beat to windward of the hawks, flying as rapidly as possible, and yet keeping himself prepared for sudden defence. All the horses were put to full speed, and in a moment the whole scene became one of cry and confusion.

'Call the merlin up the wind! Call the merlin up the wind!' cried the Princess to the chief falconer. 'See!' see! he is towering;

he will miss his stoop!'

'So ho! woa ho!' cried the falconer, with a loud whistle: 'he will make his point yet, your Grace.' But the heron, finding himself over-reached, made a dip, skimmed, and evaded the fall or stoop of the falcon, which, being a young bird, had endeavoured to strike it at once, without being perfectly sure of its aim. The clamour and the galloping now became more eager than ever, the bird making directly for the wood, which it seemed likely to gain, notwithstanding the efforts of its about half a mile in the wood there was a pursuers.

could be conceived for such sport; and the rein being freely given to each horse, the whole party dashed on at full speed, without seeing, or caring for the massy clouds, that, sweeping together over head, directly in the face of a light and flickering wind, that was blowing from the north-west, seemed to threaten a storm of some kind. The air, too, great forest; and the horses-animals pecugraceful a cavalier as ever entered hall or usual, and were soon in a complete lather of

The grey merlin which had been carried by Mary of Burgundy retrieved the error of its first eagerness, and, cutting between the heron and the wood, kept it off for some time over turning to one of the falconers,—'but how is the meadow and the stream. The sport was it?—can you find no bird, in all the length of thus in its highest point of interest, and the horses in full career, when a sudden flash of lightning broke across their path, and startled the whole party. Each horse involun-tarily recoiled. The Princess and Alice of Imbercourt both kept their seats, but the young lady who followed them, less skilful in her management, was thrown violently to the ground; while her horse, wild with fright, dashed madly across the meadow and plunged into the stream. The falconers rode forward to whistle back their hawks-the service most important in their eyes,-and one of the grooms galloped after the frightened horse, in order to catch him ere he was irrecoverably lost. But the rest of the party, instantly dismounting, surrounded the poor girl who had met with the accident, whom they found severely bruised, but not otherwise dangerously hurt. She complained bitterly, however, and, as if conscious that she was not a very interesting person otherwise, made the most of her misfortune to engross attention.

The horse and the hawks were soon recovered, but it became now the question, what was to be the course of their farther proceeding. Large drops of rain were beginning to fall-everything portended sa tremendous storm. The young lady who had fallen was too much bruised to sit her horse with ease, and was, or appeared to be, too much terrified to attempt it again. She, nevertheless, entreated the Princess and her companions to return as fast as possible towards Tirlemont, leaving her where she was, with some one to protect her, and to send a litter from the town to bring her home. But to this the Princess would by no means consent; and it having been suggested by one of the grooms, who knew the country well, that at the distance of small chapel dedicated to Nôtre-Dame du The meadow was the finest even ground that, bon Secours, it was determined that the whole party should proceed thither, and wait till the storm was over, or till one of the attendants could procure litters for the ladies from Tirlemont.

They accordingly proceeded on their way, under the guidance of the groom, who alone knew the situation of the chapel; and; skirting round under the branches of the taller had that sultry, oppressive weight which trees, endeavoured to obtain shelter on their one often feels in the neighbourhood of a way from the large drops of rain that, slow and heavy, but far apart, seemed scarcely so liarly susceptible to the feelings produced much to fall as to be cast with violence from by a quantity of electricity in the atmo- the heaven to the earth. The clouds, in the sphere-seemed more eager and fiery than meantime, came rolling slowly up, seeming to congregate over the forest from every part to the benighted or storm-staid traveller, or of the sky; but still it was some minutes be- of giving the pious and devout an opportunity first, which had startled their horses, and the for a favourable journey begun or completed, into a kind of midday twilight by the dull, up by casual donations, or by some small enthick, leaden clouds above. The roar of the dowment, I do not know; but, at all events, reached that degree of intensity which it was destined soon to attain, the Princess and her attendants did not neglect the warning, but hastened on as rapidly as possible, though the

The road—if the glade or opening in the forest could so be called-led on in that straight line of direct progression, which seems to have been the original plan of roadproud disdain of obstacles and difficulties, into the deepest valleys, and up the sides of the steepest hills, without one effort by sweep or turn of any kind to avoid either. Thus, in a few minutes after the entrance of the Princess's party into the forest, the groom led the way over the side of a hill, down the steep descent of which the trunks and arching boughs of the trees might be seen in long perspective, forming a regular alley, filled with a kind of dim and misty light. At the end of the descent, however, the trees, in some degree, broke away to the westward, and a steep hill rose suddenly before the travellers, which seemed, at its original formation, to have trees to the very top. Over the shoulder of wandered over many miles of rich wood land, this hill,-just between the part which remained wooded, and the path which, sloping down to the forest below, lay for the distance of several acres, either entirely bare or merely covered with scattered brushwood,—the road, now assuming a sandy appearance, climbed straight up to a spot where a small building with a conical roof was seen standing out from the dark wood, at the very top of the rise, and cutting sharp upon a gleam of yellow light, which-dimmed by the falling shower, and fast closing up under the gathering clouds-vet lingered in the western sky.

The sight of the chapel, for so it was, gave fresh vigour to all the party; and Mary, with her followers, hastened up, and reached the shower—in some places so dark as totally to little shrine before another flash of lightning took place. The chapel, as usual with such buildings in that age, was constructed for the of rain the eye caught the prospect of a bright mere purpose of affording a temporary refuge and sunshiny country, over which the clouds fore another flash of lightning followed the of offering up their prayers or thanksgivings whole party had reached the glade in the before an image of the Virgin, which filled a wood, which the groom assured them led niche in the far part of the edifice, protected direct to the chapel, ere a second bright blaze from profaning hands by a strong grating of broke across the gloomy air, now shadowed iron. Whether the building itself was kept thunder followed a few seconds after; and the funds which supported it were too small though it was evident that the storm had not for the maintenance of an officiating priest; and hermits, who had occasionally supplied the place in former ages, were now becoming ' of the rare birds of the earth,' at least in the north of Europe. Thus the chapel was totally long grass, cut merely by the tracks of vacant when the Princess and her attendants wood-carts, and mingled thickly with bram- reached it; and after offering up a prayer at bles and many sorts of weeds, impeded them the shrine, while one of the grooms was greatly on their way.

despatched to Tirlemont, to give notice of Mary's situation, the most courageous of the party which remained placed themselves at the door of the little building, to watch the progress of the approaching storm. As no one making in most countries, proceeding with a dreamed of profaning the sanctity of the place, by making it a shelter for their horses, the grooms received orders to tie them as strongly as possibly under some of the neighbouring trees; and one was thus secured under a large elm, which rose a few yards in advance of the chapel.

The commanding situation of the building, being pitched high up on one of the most elevated hills of the forest, gave a wide view over the country around, and afforded one of the most beautiful forest scenes that the mind of man can imagine. First, beyond the little sandy road by the side of which the chapel stood, extended, as I have before said, several acres of broken mountain turf, sloping down started up so abruptly, as to have shaken a with a considerable descent, and only interpart of the primeval forest from one of its rupted here and there by a solitary tree, or a sides. The other side was clothed with tall clump of bushes. Beyond it again the eye clothed in all the splendid hues of autumn, from the dark shadowy evergreen to the bright golden yellow of the sear aspen; and where the ocean of woods ended, it caught the faint blue lines of a level country beyond.

At the time I speak of, the sky was full of clouds, and the yellow light which had struggled for a time to keep its place in the heavens was now totally obscured. Large dull masses, as hard and defined as if formed of some halfmolten metal, rolled slowly along the heavens, while across them floated far more rapidly some light fleecy vapours of a whitish grey. From the far extreme of these clouds was seen pouring in long straight lines the heavy obscure every thing beyond; but in other spots so thin and clear, that through the lines the distant view of bright scenes, which the ity, strike one of the noblest trees on the unquelled hopes of early life still show us edge of the wood below, and tear it in one set our youth.

the gloom of the sky; and scarcely were the nearly in the same instant the thunder folparty well housed, when another bright flash, followed close by the roar of the thunder, passed eagerly over the scene. The young lady who had fallen from her horse remained close to the shrine; but Mary of Burgundy, came a momentary pause—calm, heavy, and with her arm through that of Alice of Imbersilent, without a breath of air to stir the court, still stood by the door, looking out upon boughs, or to relieve the sultry oppressiveness the prospect below them. The last flash of of the atmosphere, and without a sound, save lightning, however, was so near, that 'Mary's eye caught a small thin line of pale-coloured duration of this state of repose was but brief. but excessively vivid light, which seemed to dart like a fiery serpent between herself and charged with electricity; and in a moment the near tree, under which one of the horses was tied.

flash was so near it made me giddy;' and withdrawing her arm she retired into the farther part of the chapel, and closed another small door which opened from the right-hand building.

a smile.

'No, certainly not afraid,' replied Mary; 'for I know that He whose weapon is the lightning, can strike as well in the palace or the tower as in the open field; but still it is useless to deny, that there is something very storm as this. It seems as if one were in the hills echoed and re-echoed the thunder, Almighty.

'It is very grand,' replied Alice of Imberto look upon the storm as the finest spectacle in nature; and I would rather see the lightnings go tilting on their fiery horses through the sky, and hear the roaring trumpets of the thunder, than sit in the gayest pavilion that ever was stretched with hands, to witness the brightest tournament that ever monarch gave.

'You are poetical, Alice,' cried the princess; 'had old George Chatelain been here he would have made fine verses out of that speech -- but, gracious heaven, what a flash!

As she spoke there came, indeed, one of those tremendous flashes of lightning that literally wrap the whole sky in flame, and for continued gazing out from the door, although the brief space that it endured, lighted up every part of the inside of the chapel, with a brightness that was painful to the eye. At the same time Alice, who still stood by the door, us,' she exclaimed; 'for this is the most tersaw clearly the brighter waving line of more rible thing I ever saw! It is fast rolling up intense fire which accompanied the broad flash the hill! dart from a spot nearly above their heads, and had not yet extended themselves, -not unlike streaming downward with unequalled rapidthrough the tears and storms that at times be- moment into atoms. She almost fancied she could hear the rending groan of the stout oak, Each moment seemed to add something to as it was shivered by the bolt of heaven; but lowed, with a sound as if a thousand rocks had been cast on the roof above their heads; and. another and another flash succeeded, before the report of the first had died away. Then the fall of an occasional drop of rain. The The whole air over the forest seemed surafter, with a loud whizzing noise, not unlike that of a musket bullet when it passes near 'Alice, I will look no more,' she said, 'that the head, a large ball of fire rushed rapidly past the chapel, in a line raised not more than a few yards above the ground, and pitched upon the point of a rock at a little distance below, where, after quivering and wavering side of the shrine into the forest behind the for a moment, it broke into a thousand fragments with a loud explosion, and vanished 'You are not afraid, lady?' said Alice with entirely. The lightning and the thunder now succeeded each other so rapidly, that there seemed scarcely an instant's interval; and flash after flash, roar after roar, continued without intermission, while every now and then the sight of a tree rent to atoms in the distant prospect marked the work of the awful in the sights and sounds of such a lightning; and the forest, and the rocks, and the presence, and heard the voice of the so that the sound became absolutely un-

This had continued for about half an hour, court; 'but from my youth I have been taught and still Alice of Imbercourt had remained gazing out upon the scene, as well as the old cavalier, who accompanied them as their principal attendant, when she suddenly exclaimed, - Good God! how extraordinary! there seems to be a thick cloud gathering upon the edge of the wood, and rolling up the hill towards us, and sweeping the ground as it comes. Holy Virgin! the lightning is flashing out of it like that from the sky! This is very terrible, indeed!'

'Come back, Alice, I beseech-I entreat!' exclaimed the princess: 'you may lose your sight or your life-you are tempting your fate.

But Alice did not seem to hear, for she still it was very evident that she now had also taken alarm.

'Now, gracious God! be merciful unto

'Come away, lady, come away,' cried the ing her from the door; 'this is no sight to slowly, but after a few minutes in a more look upon;' and he drew her back towards heavy and continuous shower, which, patterthe Princess.

Alice once more turned her eyes to gaze, and then, as if overcome with what she saw, she cast herself down upon her knees, throwing her arms around Mary, as if to protect Gallant: 'this rain will drown you cursed her from the approaching destruction, ex- cloud, and we shall get rid of the ground claiming, - 'Oh, my Princess! my Princess! lightning.' God protect thee in this terrible hour !'

ment of great danger she showed herself more calm and firm than her more daring companion. 'God will protect me,' she said, in a soft low not, His will be done.'

the whole of the inside of the building, accompanied-not followed-by a crash, as if two through space.

probable, were closed at that moment, for no one saw the small door by the side of the shrine thrown open. But the first who looked up was Mary of Burgundy, and a sudden cry as she did so called the attention of all the rest. They instantly perceived the cause of the Princess's surprise and alarm; for close beside her, in the midst of the chapel, stood a tall powerful man, habited in the ordinary equipment of a man at arms of that day; with the unusual circumstance, however, of of green; which colour was also predominant peared at the door by the shrine.

'Good God!' he exclaimed, 'do you not see the ground lightning coming up the the chapel in a moment. Matthew, catch up some of the women. Karl, take that one that has fainted. Let the men follow me as the direction it is taking.

he caught up Alice of Imbercourt in his power- just descended. ful arms. One of his companions lifted the rection opposite to that in which Alice had Alice from his arms; and then, in a low and been looking. The lightning flashed around respectful voice, he said, - 'You will here, fair them as they went, the thunder roared loud ladies, find some security. Keep as far as at every step, and the rain, which had ceased you can from the mouth of the cave, and there old cavalier, seizing her by the arm, and lead- for a time, began again to drop; at first ing thick through the withered leaves of the wood, drenched the unfortunate hawking party to the skin.

'Thank God for that I' exclaimed the Vert

These were the only words he spoke; but, Mary's hand was very cold; but in the mo- with rapid steps, he continued to bear on his fair burden for nearly a quarter of an hour, with apparently the same ease, and in somewhat of the same position, that a mother carvoice, 'if such be His good pleasure; and if ries her child. Two of his sturdy companions ot, His will be done.' followed, loaded in the same way ;—and so Asshe spoke, a tremendous flash illuminated complete was the helpless terror of the whole party who had accompanied Mary of Burgundy, that they yielded themselves passively, worlds had been hurled together in their course and without a word of inquiry, to the guidance of the green riders; a body of men who The eyes of every one in the chapel, it is acknowledged no law, though a sort of generous and chivalric spirit amongst themselves seemed, in some degree. to supply the place of the authority they had cast off. It is true, indeed, that resistance or question would have been in vain; for the superior numbers of these free gentlemen of the forest set at defiance all opposition on the part of the Princess's attendants, and a sort of taciturnity seemed to reign amongst them which did not at all encourage inquiry.

After proceeding steadily and rapidly for the every part of his garb being of a peculiar shade space of time above mentioned, over a rough and uneven road, sometimes down the side in the dress of half a dozen others who ap- of a wooded hill, where no unpractised foot could have kept its hold-sometimes through He gave no one time to express their sur- deep ravines, which the torrents of rain that were now falling had converted into watercourses-sometimes over the trunks of trees hill! Fly, fly for your lives, it will be over that had been felled and shattered by the fire of heaven-with the lightning flashing round their heads, and the thunder rolling above them, the Vert Gallant and his companions fast as possible, and we shall soon be out of at length reached a deep dell, from one side of which rose up a steep and rocky bank, So saying, and without farther ceremony, forming the base of the hill which they had

At the height of a few yards above the bot-Princess, and another raised the form of the tom of the valley, which was itself marshy and young lady who had fallen from her horse in filled with long flags and rushes, was the mouth the morning, and whose terror had now cast of a low-browed cave, to which the Vert Gallant her into a swoon, and, darting through the immediately directed his steps. He was obliged door by which they had entered, the Vert to bow his head to enter; but, within, it became Gallant of Hannut and his companions passed more lofty; and, though it did not run above out into that part of the forest which swept nine or ten yards into the mountain, the cavity up to the back of the chapel. Striking on as afforded a complete shelter from the storm fast as possible towards the east, he took his and rain. The moment he had entered, the way over the other edge of the hill, in a di- leader of the free companions gently freed tinued, in a sterner voice, turning to the male he alluded must be for pardon for his past followers of the Princess, 'should have known offences. She gazed at him for a moment or better than to have placed this lady, -who, if two before she replied, as he stood towering Burgundy,-in the most exposed and dangerous situation of the whole forest.

'Good faith, Sir Green Knight,' said the old gentleman who had accompanied the Princess, we certainly did not know that it was so dangerous, or we should neither have placed her in it, nor ourselves, as you may well sup-pose. And now, sir,' he continued,' with a voice the slight tremulousness of whose tone showed that he was not without some apprehensions of another kind-'and now, sir, that you have the lady in your power-be she Princess or not—I trust that you will deal fairly and honourably with her. Our purses are, of course, at your disposal, as well as our jewels, &c.; but I give you notice that—'

'Pshaw!' exclaimed the Vert Gallant, the beaver of whose helmet was still down, 'talk not to me of purses, sir, and jewels !- Madam,' he continued, turning to the Princess, 'suffer not, I beseech you, the vain and vulgar fears of this old man to affect you for a moment: the Vert Gallant of Hannut takes no purses from wandering travellers, nor draws the sword against ladies, far less against the Princess of Burgundy. Rest here in safety, with your fair companions, he added, turning slightly towards Alice of Imbercourt; 'and we, who have brought you hither, and have been your unseen attendants ever since you were flying your hawks by the side of the river, will guard you as well, or better, than if you were in your father's palace.

'I owe you many thanks, sir,' replied Mary; 'more, indeed, than I can at present express; for this dreadful storm has left my ideas someto your prompt assistance I stand indebted for my life.

Perhaps, madam, you do,' replied the Vert Gallant; 'for I feel convinced that, had that cloud reached the chapel before you quitted it, the coronet of Burgundy would be her in his own arms through the wood, although now without an heiress. Think me not ungenerous, madam,' he added, 'if I ask a boon in the other.'

but think that his present adventurous life must be one more of necessity than of choice; without seeing aught but boar or deer, I will

is little fear of any danger. You, sirs,' he con- and she doubted not that the petition to which I judge right, must be an object of no small above the seven or eight strong men who acsolicitude to every subject of the House of companied him, and who had now grouped themselves round the mouth of the cave, watching, as it appeared, every word of their leader's mouth with a sort of reverential atten-

'If it be wrong, sir,' she replied, 'for simple individuals to make rash promises, it is still more so for princes. But where gratitude, such as I owe you; is concerned, even prudence might be ungenerous. I must qualify, however, in some degree, the promise you desire, and say, that if your request, when it is made, prove nothing contrary to my own honour or dignity, I will give it all my influence with my father, should it depend upon him; or grant it myself, should it depend upon me.—Does that satisfy you?'
'Most fully, madam,' replied the Vert Gallant; 'and I return you deep thanks for your kind assent."

'I doubt not,' said Mary, 'that what you have to ask will be far less than a compensation for the service you have rendered me. However, accept this jewel,' she added, taking a ring from her finger and giving it to him, 'as a testimony of the promise I have made; and with it let me add many thanks for your honourable courtesy.

The leader of the free companions received the ring with due acknowledgements; and, after a few more words upon the same subject, he bowed low, as if to take his leave, and made a step towards the mouth of the

'You are not, surely, going to expose yourself to such a storm as this,' exclaimed Alice of Imbercourt, with a degree of eagerness what confused. However, I am satisfied that that made her mistress smile, and declare afterwards-when, in a place of security, they could look upon the dangers of the forest as a matter of amusement-that Alice had certainly been smitten with the distinction which the Vert Gallant had shown her, in carrying he knew that a Princess was present.

'The storm is abating, Lady,' replied the in return. It is this-that if, some day, I freebooter, 'and, besides, we fear no weather. should need your voice to support my petition I myself go to give notice to those who can with your father—or if you should at the time receive you as you should be received, that hold the reins of government yourself, when I such a noble party require better shelter and may have occasion to make a request before entertainment than we poor adventurers can the chair of Burgundy—you will give me your afford you. My men, though they must keep influence in the one case, or grant my desire out of sight, will he near enough to yield you protection and assistance, on one blast There was something in the tone and in the of a horn. Horns are strange magical things manner of the speaker at once so gentle and in this wood,' he added; 'for though all the

of another kind.

from the opposite part of the wood, a man, storm. bearing the appearance of a mounted squire, him from view.

thus followed him on his course; for the other young attendant, stupefied with all the around her. terrors and dangers she had gone through, continued sitting in silence on the ground, advanced, a low whistle was heard at a con-where the soldier who had carried her had siderable distance, was taken up by some one set her down, and still kept her hands clasped nearer, and then repeated from more than over her eyes, as if every moment would show her some horrible sight.

tinued to pour down in torrents, and an oc- heard; and, on looking forth from the mouth casional flash of lightning still broke across of the cave, Alice perceived, winding up from the sky; but it was dim, and as if half extin- the very farthest extreme of the valley, a gay guished by the deluge through which it cavalcade, consisting of a couple of horse glared. The thunder, too, followed at a litters, escorted by about twenty spearmen on longer interval; and each succeeding flash horseback, bearing the colours of the Lord was at a greater lapse of time from the one of Hannut.

that preceded it.

Thus about an hour and a half passed away, during which the different members of the falconing party amused themselves as they best might; the groom talking with the falconers, about the gallant horses they had left tied at the top of the hill, lamenting over the fright and drenching they must have been ex- THE sight of the approaching cavalcade was posed to and expressing some apprehension that very acceptable to the party in the cave, who the good gentleman in green, who had hurried were not a little tired of their situation, as them away so fast from the chapel, might we may well conceive they would be, after take advantage of their absence to carry off having waited for nearly two hours, watching their good horses, the worst of which, he de- the dying away of a thunderstorm, which, clared, was worth fifty golden crowns of Flor-ence at the lowest computation. The falcon-hard leaden clouds which had poured forth ers, on the other hand, who had taken care to the lightning would soften into the showery bring away their birds with them, busied haze of an unsettled autumn night. themselves actively in providing for the comfort of their hawks; and each administered but slowly, -every now and then pausing and soon show you that we can conjure up beasts to the falcon under his special charge a small ball of choice medicaments, extracted from a So saying, he approached the mouth of the pouch that they carried by their sides, in cavern, and wound his horn with a long, order to guard the stomachs of those noble shrill, peculiar blast; when in a moment after fowls from any evils as a consequence of the

The old gentleman, who might be controtted rapidly forth, leading a strong black sidered-what we should call in the present charger, which he at once brought up to the day—the chaperon of the party, stood by the mouth of the cave. A few words whispered side of the Princess, and addressed to her, by the Vert Gallant to the men who had ac- from time to time, with sweet unmeaning companied him hitherto, caused them instantly smiles and courtly language, a variety of easy to quit the place where they had taken refuge; flowing sentences, very pleasant and harmonand, dispersing themselves over the side of the jous, but signifying nothing. Alice, on her part, hill, the whole were in a few minutes lost generallyremained silent and thoughtful though to the sight amongst the trees and bushes. seemingly a little agitated, and, perhaps, not Their leader, once more, bowed low to the Princess, sprang upon his horse, dashed eastle of Hannut. Sometimes she would sit rapidly down the rough and uneven side of at the side of the Princess, and speak with the hill, plunged through the marsh that lined her, with all the light gaiety of her character; the bottom of the valley, and, in a moment but, at others, she would fall into long lapses after, was seen, followed by his squire, of deep and silent thought; or would stand winding in and out through the tall trees on at the mouth of the cave, and watch the dimthe opposite slope, till the turn of the hill hid inishing rain and the storm as it passed away. Every minute it decreased in some degree; It was the eyes of Alice of Imbercourt that and even the poor girl who had fallen from her horse, and who was clearly the most Princess had seated herself on a mass of rock timid of the whole party, began to look up, in the farther extreme of the cave; and her and to venture an occasional word to those

At length, when the day was somewhat far twenty places in the wood, till at last it sounded close by the cave. All then relapsed into pro-The storm had, nevertheless, abated confound silence; but, at the end of about ten siderably already. The rain, it is true, conminutes, a distinct trampling sound was

CHAPTER XVII.

THE ASTROLOGER'S TOWER.

The troop, however, seemed to approach looking round the valley, as if doubtful of the down the bank. There are few things show exact place to which their steps should be so substantially the mighty and awful power directed. At length Alice took an impatient of death as to see a noble horse killed by step out into the shower, and was followed by some sudden accident. The moment before one of the falconers; who soon attracted the it stands at the sublimest point of animal notice of the horsemen by one of the long and existence—as if the living principle were peculiar whoops practised in his vocation. yielded to it in a greater share than any in the furs and embroideries which designated carrion. a man of noble rank in the country, dashed forward from the rest; and the next instant her eyes fell upon the gallant beast lying Hugh de Mortmar was by the side of his stretched out beneath the tree: 'alas, the fair Alice.

strange horseman, he said, whom the warder and the fate she had so narrowly escaped; described as bearing the appearance of one of and, closing her eyes, while the litter was the free companions who infested the country, borne on, she spent a few moments in thankhad given notice at the barbacan of the castle ful prayer. that the Princess Mary and her train were storm-staid in that valley which in the forest bore the name of 'The Valley of the Marsh;'

to tender his service and assistance.

The young gentleman then, with deep re- jured by the storm, but no trace could be disspect, tendered his aid to the Princess. Mary covered of the animals themselves. and her attendants were soon placed in the the thunderstorm.

little awful. Three of the walls of the chapel, indeed, remained, but that was all; and the time-dried wood-work that had supported the tall conical roof, now lay on what had once drawn up in the court-yards, received the been the floor, still blackened and smouldering, though the fire which had been kindled reverence; and the old lord himself waited by the lightning was now half extinguished by bare-headed to hand her from the vehicle the subsequent rain. The chapel itself, how- which had conveyed her thither. She was ever, though it showed how terrible her own instantly conducted to the apartments which fate might have been, was not, perhaps, the Alice of Imbercourt had inhabited during her most fearful object that the spot presented. The tall, majestic tree which had stood alone had left behind, in the hope of a speedy reat a few yards in advance of the building, was rent to the very ground; and, amidst the shivered boughs and yellow leaves with which they were covered, lay motionless the beauti- had made this change of dress to the little ful horse that had been tied there, with its sitting-room or bower-as it was called, in strong and energetic limbs—but a few hours the castles of the nobility of that time—the before full of wild life and noble fire—now Princess found that supper had been laid out cold and stiff,—the wide expansive nostril, for her there, rather than in the hall; but at small and collapsed-the clear eye, dim and the same time she perceived, by the solitary

The moment after, a young cavalier, habited other thing, -and the next, it is shapeless

'Alas, the poor horse!' cried Mary, when poor horse!' But, by a natural link of asso-A few words of explanation sufficed. A ciation, her mind speedily reverted to herself,

> The other horses, which had been tied at a little distance to the east of the chapel, appeared to have broken their bridles through and that, of course, he had instantly set jout fear, and to have escaped. The trees under which they had been fastened remained unin-

After the lapse of a few minutes spent in litters, or mounted on the spare horses; and the search, the cavalcade moved on at a as it was too late to think of returning to quicker pace; and Mary of Burgundy soon Tirlemont, the whole party wound onward observed, with a smile, that Hugh de Morttowards the castle of Hannut. At the earnest mar, though often at the side of the litter in request of the poor groom, however, as the which she herself had been placed, offering road by the chapel was not longer than that all those formal attentions which her rank by which the young noble had come, it was and station required, was still more frequently preferred in returning to the castle, in order in the neighbourhood of the one which folto relieve the horses that had been tied in the lowed, and which contained her fair attendneighbourhood; and, choosing a longer but ant, Alice, alone. The young waiting-woman, easier ascent than that which had been trod who had shared the Princess's conveyance, so rapidly by the Vert Gallant some hours remarked the particular attentions of the before, the Princess was soon once more on young lord also, and commented on it with the spot from which she had been carried in some acerbity: but her jealous anger was soon repressed by Mary's sweet smile; and The scene that she there beheld was not a ere long the whole cavalcade wound through the barbacan and the manifold gates of the castle of Hannut.

The retainers of the lord of the mansion, heiress of Burgundy and Flanders with feudal stay; and a part of the wardrobe which she turn, now served to replace the damp garments of the Princess.

On returning from the chamber where she leaden, and the proud head cast powerless cover which graced the table, while the Lord to attend upon her, that she was to be served rose into enthusiasm as he spoke of Medici, with all the formal state and ceremony of a and of all that his magnificent efforts were sovereign princess.

'Nay, nay, my lord,' she said, with a smile, 'I must not suffer all this. While I am here, I must have you consider me as a what it might one time accomplish were venwandering damoiselle, whom you have delivered from danger and distress, and with whose rank or station you are unacquainted. All, therefore, of noble blood, must sit and haps, one of the weaknesses of that age to partake with me of my supper, or I partake attribute great and mysterious powers to not myself.'

The old Lord of Hannut, well knowing the formal ceremony maintained at the court of Burgundy, especially during the previous reign, would fain have remonstrated; but Mary cut him short, laying her hand kindly Mary of Burgundy command?-Well, then, be it so :- we command you, my lord, to forget from this moment that there is any one beneath your roof but a dear friend of your more seriously, 'that I know no greater enyou, my lords, must have felt in unbuckling your armour after a long day's tournament.'

required the Lord of Hannut to press further the ceremonious respect he had been about to show, he had too much of the truer polite- deep and anxious thought, have I given, ness of the heart not to yield at once to the Princess's wishes thus expressed. More covers were instantly laid upon the table; and, assuming easily the station of host, in place of learned and the wise-I cannot doubt, that of feudal subject, he treated his fair guests during supper with easy courtesy, mingled indeed, but not loaded, with respect.

The time passed pleasantly, and many a varied topic of conversation, regarding all those matters that were interesting in that age, whiled the minutes insensibly away. The ruder subjects, indeed, connected with the state of society as it then existed,-arms, and love, and the hunting-field, the news of the day, and the gossip of the town,-were the first things spoken of, as matters on which all could But speedily, as each tried the converse. other's powers, and found that there were less ordinary subjects on which they might communicate, the conversation turned to arts, to letters, and to the human mind. Hugh de Mortmar, whose travels through many lands had made him acquainted with things but scantily known even at the luxurious court of Burgundy, told of the efforts that Italy was then beginning to make to cast off the darkness which had so long hung over her states, described many a beautiful object that deed than was usual in that age-but nevertheof Hannut and Hugh de Mortmar stood by he had seen in the land of ancient arts, and likely to restore to Italy.

The newly discovered art of printing, too, was mentioned and discussed, and surmises of tured on that occasion which would astonish those who see them only partly realised even in the present day. But if was, pereverything that was new and unusual; and, though clear and philosophical reasoning guided the Lord of Hannut to some of his anticipations in regard to printing, a vague degree of superstition, or perhaps it might be called mysticism, added not a little. It was and gently on the old man's arm, and saying, an easy transition from considering what in a soft and somewhat playful tone, 'Must the mind could do to consider what the mind of man even thendid; and Mary, half fearful of offending, yet with her curiosity not a little excited, led the conversation to those dark and mysterious arts, in the study of which the sweet niece, Alice. Believe me, she added, Lord of Hannut was supposed to pass the greater part of his time. Upon that branch of joyment than to cast aside the trammels of what were then called the dark sciences, which state, and the cold weight of ceremony, and referred to the communication of mortal belet my heart play free. To me, it is like what ings with the spiritual world, the old lord was profoundly silent; but in the accuracy and reality of the art by which man was then Although the politeness of that day was of supposed to read his future fate, by the the stately and rigid kind, which might have bright and mysterious orbs of heaven, he expressed his most deep and sincere conviction.

'Many a long and weary night, many a said, 'to the subject; and, after the study of nearly forty years-after searching philosophy and Scripture-after consulting the madam, that the science which the Chaldee shepherds studied and acquired in the plains of the East has come down to us, though not in the degree of clear accuracy to which they had brought it. Our calculations are sometimes slightly wrong,-a day-a month -a year sometimes, too early or two late, -but, on examination, I have always found that the error was in the imperfection of my own knowledge, not in a deceitful prognosti-cation of the stars.'

The mind of woman is naturally more bent towards superstition than that of man. Mary of Burgundy had heard her father rave against astrologers as quacks and impostors, especially whenever their predictions did not accord with his own designs; but she had heard him also express, on many an occasion, a desire for their council; and even the abuse which he showered upon them, had shown her how much importance he attached to their predictions. Her belief, indeed, in their skill was not untinged with doubt-more, inher belief for the time to certainty.

' I wish, 'she replied, with a smile, in answer to what he had last said-'I wish that I had low, I entreat, your own judgment alone. I here noted down, the correct day, and hour urge you not to read or to forbear; yet, as and minute of my birth, that I might ask you, my memory serves me, you may read without my lord, to give me some insight into my future fate.'

plied the old nobleman, 'your desire might soon be gratified. Too much interest have I ever felt in the house of Burgundy, not to ob- Alice; lend me your arm, My lord, I will tain every particular of information necessary to discover exactly, as far as human science 'Ho, without, there !—a light!—a light! can reach, the destinies and fate of each child exclaimed the Lord of Hannut. 'Pause yet of that race.

'Indeed!' cried Mary; 'and can you, then, calculate for me, with any degree of accuracy, the lot that is likely to befal me in life?'—and her eyes, as she spoke, turned with a glance of inquiring interest towards Alice of Imber-

the old lord's skill.

'I can do more, lady,' cried the Lord of it?'

I do; and thank you, sir.

written,' said the Lord of Hannut, "must of Burgundy, as she advanced in the firm never leave the chamber where it has been so long preserved; and I can but suffer one per- her future life laid open before her eyes. son to accompany you to its perusal. Choose then, lady! who shall it be?

me?'

'Willingly-willingly,' replied the lively

'Let me beseech you not to go, madam,'

less it was still belief; and the calm and serious panied them thither: 'I never yet did know assurances of a man so famous for his wisdom any one who attempted to pry into the hidden and his skill as the Lord of Hannut, raised secrets of fate, who did not bitterly repent

'Madam,' said the Lord of Hannut, 'folmuch apprehension; for though you may have ture fate.' many a painful scene yet to go through—as 'Were such really your wishes, lady,' re- who in life has not?—still there will be bright days, and many, before the end.'
'I will go, my lord,' replied Mary.' 'Come, follow you.

a moment, lady. The sun is down, and the dim and narrow passages of this building are not to be trod by a stranger without more light than you twilight sky will now afford. Bear a torch to the end of the gallery, Roger,' he added, speaking to a tall old man, who court, as if for confirmation of her belief in appeared at his summons. 'Now, madam, permit me to lead you on.

Thus speaking, he took the hand of the Hannut: 'I can show you a page where the Princess reverently in his own, and led her whole is already written. While you were from the chamber, followed by Alice of Imyet in the cradle, the interest which every one bercourt. The next moment, Mary found takes in those who are destined to rule nations, herself in a long gallery, pierced by many led me to draw the scheme of your nativity, windows turned to the westward, through and to learn everything concerning your part which might be seen the fiery streaks left by in the future, which human science could distinct the setting sun upon the verge of the stormy in the future, which human science could discover. At the same time the famous Anthony sky. Manifold doors opened opposite to of Palermo separately undertook the same these windows, and between the apertures the distance of many hundred miles, each sent to the other a transcript of the result. The difference between our calculations was so slight as scarcely to merit the name; and I can now place before your eyes the two combined. I pledge my word to you, that more of war called up. At the end of this long than eighteen years have elansed since those corridor was a wide archway, at which, ere than eighteen years have elapsed since those corridor was a wide archway, at which, ere calculations were made; and from the past, which you cannot doubt, you shall learn to lery, a figure took its place, bearing a lighted judge of the future, Do you desire to see torch; and though the whole arrangement of the building was, in that age, more coin-Mary turned somewhat pale, and paused mon, and consequently appeared less gloomy, ere she replied; but at length she answered- than it would seem at present; still there was an aspect of solemn grandeur about it, that 'The book in which that eventful page is raised, and yet saddened, the feelings of Mary belief that she was about to see the scheme of Passing through the archway, with the torch-bearer preceding them, the old lord 'Alice,' said the Princess, 'will you go with and his two fair companions wound round the greater part of the building, in order to reach the apartment in which he pursued his studies, girl, 'if my uncle promise beforehand to without passing through the common hall; call up no spirits to terrify us out of our and as they swept along the dark and narrow passages, with the torch-light flashing on the rude and mouldered stone, the sense of awe exclaimed the old cavalier, who had accom- and expectation increased in the bosom of the too, felt it, and was profoundly silent; and curiosity to triumph over reason; -at least, when at length they entered the chamber, in she added, with a smile, 'you can say that which the lonely hours of a long life had been there is one woman in the world who, when spent in solitary and mysterious study, she the book of destiny was laid open before her, gazed around her with a glance of curiosity and apprehension, which clearly showed that she herself had never set her foot within its The silver lamp hung lighted walls before. from the roof; and the attendant with his torch drew back to let them pass, carefully avoiding, however, to set his foot across the threshold.

Mary's heart beat quick, and she now began to ask herself whether she had any right to unveil that awful future over which the Almighty had cast so profound a shadow. What was she about to do? To learn her fate, without the possibility of changing it-to ac- however much restrained by respect, was suffiquire the knowledge of each event that was to ciently apparent; and Mary, whose spirits had happen, without the power of avoiding it or ruling it as it arose-to mark every danger while yet it lay in the womb of the future-to foreknow every pang while yet it was far distant-to sip the cup of agony and fear, drop by drop, long before fate compelled her to the draught - and to make each day miserable with the certainty of the morrow's sorrow.

mind, the old noble took down one of the large volumes from the cabinet, and unfastening the golden clasps with which it was bound, he laid it on the desk beneath the lamp .-'Madam,' he said, 'you wished to know the Event by event have I marked the current of the past, and I have found no error yet in what is there written. Read, then, we all live, and that we all must die, every turn of your coming existence is there written

Mary took a step forward towards the book .-laid her fair hand upon the yellow leavesthen paused, and gazed upwards for a mo-

'No!' she exclaimed at length-'no! it is wiser-it is better as it is! Most merciful was the decree of the Most High, that veiled the future in uncertainty. Forgive me, God, that I have sought to pry beyond the limits that thou thyself hast set. No, no! I will not the lethargy of grief into which the deread!' So saying, she drew hastily back, as feat at Morat had thrown him for many if afraid of her own determination-cast open weeks. the door, and quitted the apartment.

prise. 'Madam,' he said, as he offered his next morning, escorted by Hugh de Mortmar hand to guide the Princess through the pas- and a large body of armed retainers, as well sages which the want of the torch now ren- as a party of her own attendants, who had dered totally dark, 'I will not say you have arrived from Tirlemont, she passed through done wrong; but you have, I own, surprised the forest, and proceeded on the visitation

'My lord,' replied the Princess, 'I feel county of Flanders.

Princess almost to the height of pain. Alice, that I have done right, and have not suffered refused to read !'

'It is, indeed, a wonder which may well be noted down,' replied the old nobleman; 'but, I believe, we have left another behind who may not have the same prudence-Alice.' He added aloud, - 'Alice! beware! Close the door, fair niece,' he added, as the young lady followed; and having seen that it was fastened, he led the way back to the apartments which the Princess was to occupy for the night.

The party they now rejoined were, as may be naturally supposed, full of curiosity, which, risen since her determination had been formed, told them at once, with gay good humour, that she had been afraid to read; 'And therefore,' she said, 'I can tell you nothing of the future-for, thank God! I know nothing. 'I am happy then, madam,' said Hugh de Mortmar, 'that I can tell you something of the present which may make up for the dis-While such thoughts passed through her appointment; and what I can tell you is good. A messenger has arrived during your brief absence, bringing news from Lorraine. My lord, your father is, as you doubtless know, in the field; and, notwithstanding the checks of Granson and Morat, has an army fate of your future years:--it is now before in better condition than ever. Of all this you are aware; but now you will be glad to hear that Regnier of Lorraine, and all his Switzers, have fled before the Duke, across the Moand with full confidence; for as sure as that selle; that Dieulewart, Pont a Mouchon, and Pont, have surrendered to Burgundy; and that the general of the enemy has left his army, and retired to Germany.

Such tidings in regard to the present, banished the thoughts of the future, which the preceding events had called up; and the messenger, being summoned to the presence of the Princess, repeated the joyful news he had brought, in a more circumstantial manner; and added the still more important information, in Mary's eyes, that her father was in good health, and had totally shaken off

Thus passed the evening of the Princess's The Lord of Hannut followed in some sur- stay in the castle of Hannut; and early the which she was making to various cities in the

In each and all she was received with loud of the limbs, which denotes so strongly that of Commines and good John Molinet ob- the human heart. served of their countrymen, the Flemings, through the land, Mary fondly fancied that my authority—scoffed at my rebuke—but the Flemings had been a people greatly trastill my blood poured through his veins;—duced, and believed that their hearts and best and to die such a death—by the common government. That such, under all circumstances and in every time, should be the cha- like the carrion of a horse l' and, once more, racter of her own sway, she firmly resolved, he gave way to tears and groans. Then again and she returned to Ghent, convinced that he would exclaim, - The fiends! the incarpeace, good will, and union of purpose, would nate fiends !- to slaughter my poor boy like a ever reign between her and the honest com- wolf—to refuse prayers, entreaties, gold! mons of Flanders.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE DRUGGIST'S GRIEF.

WE must make our narrative of the events which took place in Ghent precede the arrival of the Princess in that city by a few days, as her return did not take place till the evening of the 10th of January, 1477; and it may be necessary to mark particularly some circumstances which occurred on the 8th of that month; premising, however, that the local government had been left in the hands of the sounded along the passage.

I ord of Imbercourt during her absence.

'Out of my way!' cried the one, in a harsh,

the reader, was a small dark chamber in one of the largest mercantile houses in Ghent, but far removed from the warehouse or the shop, and fitted up with a degree of luxury and ele-The walls were hung with rich tapestry; car- him to every one. pets of the same fabric covered the floor. Silver lamps and small round mirrors-then do, lad,' replied the first. 'Out of my way, one of the most costly articles of furniturehung around; and, in short, the whole in-terior of the room presented an aspect of wealth and comfort which might well rival the modern days.

circumstances combined to show that the he seemed to recognise the voice of the apartment was the abode of sorrow. Only speaker who sought to force his way in; and, one of the lamps was lighted. The cloak and snatching the dagger hastily from the table, bonnet of a citizen of the time were cast reck- he placed it in his bosom, wiped away the lessly on the ground, near the door. A small marks of tears from his eyes, and then cast dagger lay upon the table; and, in a seat be- himself back again in his seat. fore it, with his eyes buried in his hands, and his body shaken with convulsive sobs, sat the opened, and Maillotin du Bac, the prévôt of and joyful acclamations; for as both Philip despair has mastered the citadel of hope in

From time to time, the sobs and groans they always adored the heirs of the country which struggled from his bosom, gave way to till they were invested with the real authority; momentary exclamations—sometimes loud but from the moment they succeeded to the and fierce, sometimes muttered and low. 'He sovereignty, they became objects of as much was my son, he would exclaim,—'ay, not-detestation and abuse, as they before were, of withstanding all, he was my son! He had love and applause. Thus, as she progressed robbed me, it is true—taken my gold—resisted wishes would surely follow a mild and just hangman!—like a dog!—to hang over the gate of the city, for the ravens to eat him, can they be fathers?-out upon them, coldhearted tigers !--he has done no more than many a man has done. What though the woman was wronged?—what though her brother was slain in the affray?—Do not these proud nobles do worse every day?--Besides, she should have had gold, oceans of gold ;-but now I will have revenge-deep, bitter, insatiable revenge!' and he shook his thin bony hand in the air, while the fire of hell itself seemed gleaming from the bottom of his small dark eyes.

At that moment there was a noise heard without; and the voices of two persons in some degree of contention, as if the one strove to prevent the other from entering,

The scene to which we wish to introduce sharp, grating tone; 'I tell you, boy, I to reader, was a small dark chamber in one must enter; I have business with your master. I enter everywhere, at all times and seasons.

'But don't you know, sir, what has hapgance only known in Europe, at that time, to pened?' cried the other voice; 'my master is the great Flemish or Venetian merchants. in great affliction, and bade us deny sight of

'I know all about it, much better than you I say, or I will knock your head against the wall.

The little druggist had started up at the first sounds; and, after gazing upon the door for a moment, with the fierce intensity of the At the time I speak of, however, various tiger watching his victim before the spring,

Almost at the same moment the door little druggist, Ganay, displaying that sort of the Duke of Burgundy, appeared, together dejected disarray of dress, and careless fall with a lad, who seemed to be a serving boy of the druggist's. The Prévôt was habited in to do with it; not alone from considering the a different manner, on the present occasion, right or wrong of the matter, but because I from that in which we have before depicted had a regard for yourself, and that there are He was no longer either clad in arms, as he had appeared at the castle of Hannut, or wrapped in bandages, as he had shown himself before the council. His dress was now a rich and costly suit of fine cloth, splendidly embroidered, together with a bonnet of the same colour, in which, as was very customary amongst the nobles, he wore the brush of a fox, slightly drooping on one side, as it may sometimes be seen in the cap of the successful hunter of the present day. Over his more from his seat, 'how knew you that I hated gaudy apparel, however, he had cast a long him?—at least, before this last dark deed?' black cloak, bordered with sable, which he probably used, in general, on occasions of ten years ago, when the people of Ghent were mourning.

'This person will have entrance,' said the youth who accompanied him, addressing the little druggist, 'notwithstanding all I can do to prevent him.'

the door, and get thee gone.

The boy readily obeyed the order he received; and Maillotin du Bac, advancing into the room, saluted the druggist with some degree of formal courtesy, not unmixed with that solemnity of aspect wherewith men do reverence to griefs they personally feel but Ganay!' he said, taking a seat close by the druggist—' health and better cheer to you! This is a sad business indeed, and I wish to speak over it with you.

The druggist eyed him for a moment or two in bitter silence, while his heavy eyebrows were drawn together till they met, and almost concealed the small piercing eyes beneath

'You are kind, Sir Prèvôt,' he said, in a sneering tone; 'you are mighty kind; but let me tell you, that were it not that I hear there has been something strange—I know not whether to say friend y—in the conduct that you have pursued through all that is gone, I would soon show you how a man deserves to be treated, who forces himself upon a father on the day of his son's death.

' Why now, Master Ganay, I can bear with you a great deal,' replied the Prévôt; 'and therefore say what you will, I shall not be offended: but you very well know, that I would not myself, nor would I suffer any of my men to have anything to do with this bad business, either in regard to the arrest or the execution.'

'Murder! call it murder,' cried the druggist, grasping the arm of his chair, with a convul-sive motion of his hand.

'Well, murder be it,' replied the Prévôt, 'though they say they did it all by law. But, however, I did not choose to have anything

two or three little feelings in common between

'Ay, indeed!' cried the druggist; 'and what may they be?'

Maillotin du Bac laid his large, strong, bony hand upon the arm of the druggist, and fixing his keen hawk-like eyes upon his face, replied,- 'First and foremost-hatred to Imbercourt.'

'Ha!' cried the druggist, almost starting

'Because,' replied Maillotin du Bac, 'some pressing boldly round the Duke, and shouting for their privileges, I saw this Imbercourt give a contemptuous buffet to a man who had caught him by the robe? Do you remember such a thing? The man was a rich druggist Hinder him not,' replied Ganay, 'but shut of Ghent; and in his first fury he got his knife half way out of his bosom—not unlike that which lies in your own, Master Ganay but the moment after he put it up again, as he saw the Duke's horsemen riding down; and, with a smooth face and pleasant smile, said to the man who had struck him,—"We shall meet again, fair sir."

'Ay, and we have met again-but how?-' Health and better cheer to you, Master but how?' cried the druggist, grasping the arm of the Prévôt tight as he spoke; 'how have we met again? Not as it should have been-for vengeance on the insolent oppressor; -no, but to go on my knees before him-to humble myself to the very dust-to drop my tears at his feet-to beseech him to spare my child's life.'

'And he spurned you away from him, of course,' replied Maillotin du Bac, eagerly.

'No, no,' answered the druggist; 'no, no, he did not spurn me-but he did worse-he pretended to pity me. He declared that what I asked was not in his power-that he had not pronounced the sentence-that it was the eschevins of the city-and that he had no right nor authority to reverse the judgment. Oh! that I should have been the cursed idiot to have humbled myself before him-to be pitied, to be commiserated by him whose buffet was still burning on my cheek-to be called poor man! unhappy father !- to be prayed to take some wine, as if I had not the wherewithal to buy it for myself. Out upon them all!—eternal curses light upon their heads, and sink them all to hell!—and, as he spoke, the unhappy man gave way to one of those fearful fits of wrath which had divided his moments, during the whole of that day, with grief as bitter and unavailing.

Maillotin du Bac let the first gust of passion have its way, with that sort of calm indifferent management of the other's grief which showed how familiar his ruthless office had tic, and you shall have revenge -- As I am tempest had in some degree passed, 'it was just like him.; a cold calculating person enough he is, and was, and always will be! Much should I like to hear, though, how it happened that he had no power to grant pardon. Did not the Princess give him full power when she went?

'He said, not! he said, not!' cried the druggist, eagerly; 'and if he lied, with a father's tears dewing his feet-a father's agony before his eyes—he has purchased a place for himself as deep as Judas in the fiery abyss, if there be such a place, at least, as monks for his sake.

'But why did you not pray him,' demanded the Prévôt, 'to stay the execution till the return of the Princess herself? she would have granted you an easy pardon, and your boy's life might have been saved.

'I did, I did,' replied the unhappy father; self, re-appeared. 'I did pray-I did beseech-for a day-for an hour; but he would not listen to me. He said that the circumstances of the case would not justify such an action; that the proofs were clear and undoubted; that he-he, my poor luckless boy-had committed an offence heinous in the eyes of God and man; that he had outraged a defenceless woman, and slain a fellow creature to escape from the punishment of the crime he had committed! Oh! may the time come, that he himself may plead for mercy to ears as deaf and inexorable! Mark me, Sir Prévôt, mark me! men say lightly that they would give a right hand for some trifling nothing that they covet in this world-some rare jewel, or some painted hood, or some prancing horse; but I would lay down both these old hands, and bid the hangfor one hour of sweet revenge.

Bac, in his usual common-place tone-

'If such be the case?' exclaimed the other, starting up with a new and violent burst of passion: 'if such be the case? I tell thee it is, man! Why came you here? What do you want with me? Beware how you urge a desperate man! What seek you? What offer you? Do you come to give me revenge? If me no ifs, Sir Prévôt. Come you to give revenge?

'I do,' replied the Prévôt, who had been waiting till the other had run out his hasty exclamations; 'I do, Master Ganay, if you can recover your cool tranquillity, and argue some difficult points with me, with the calm policy with which, I have heard, that you can bend some of your young and inexperienced he had laid down as the general rule of his comrades to your purpose. But recollect yourself—be determined, collected, and poli-rendered him with every expression of human a living man! he added, seeing the druggist's misery and despair. 'Ay,' he said, after the eyes fix upon him with a look of stern in-

'Then I am calm!' answered the old man; 'as calm as the dead. I seek but that one thing-revenge! Thou sayest true, Sir Prévôt; I have been moved-far too much moved.-I, who am wont to stir the mind of others, while I keep my own as tranquil as a still lake, I should not have yielded to such mad despair, but should only have thought how I might repay the mighty debts I owe to some below the moon. Pardon me, and forget what you have seen-but you have never lost a child ;-you have never seen your only would have us believe; -would it were true one given to the butchers. But I am calm, as I said, quite calm; and I will be calmer Ho, boy! without there!' and rising from the table, he threw open the door, and rang a small silver hand-bell which stood beside him; and in answer to the tones of which, the boy who had before presented him-

'Bring me,' said the druggist, 'that small box of the precious juice of the Thebaid, which the Venetian merchants sent me as pure and unadulterated. Let us be silent till it comes,' he added, speaking to the Prévôt; 'it will soon calm all but the settled purpose. I marvel that I thought not of its virtues before.'

The boy soon returned, bringing a small box of sanders wood, in which-wrapped in innumerable covers, to preserve its virtueswas a quantity of pure opium, from the mass of which the druggist pinched off a small portion, and swallowed it, much to the surprise of Maillotin du Bac, who held all drugs in sovereign abhorrence. However violent might be his passions, Ganay, by the influence of a powerful mind, had acquired such complete man strike them off-ay, with a smile-but command over them, on all ordinary occurrences, that seldom, if ever, had they over-'If such be the case,' replied Maillotin du powered his control in the course of life. On the present occasion, indeed, despair and mental agony had conquered all for a time; but, even before he had swallowed the opium, he had recovered his power; and, speedily, as that great narcotic began to exercise its soothing influence upon the irritated fibres of his corporeal frame, the mind acquired still greater ascendency, and he felt no little shame and contempt for himself, on account of the weak burst of frenzied violence to which he had given way in the presence of the Prévôt.

He was too politic, however, when he had recovered, to show that he did contemn the feelings to which he had given way; and he at once prepared to play with Maillotin du Bac the same shrewd and artificial part which was one of those men in whom a sort of hatred. Had there been one defect in the natural instinct, as well as the continual habit chain,—had not the motive for vengeance of observation, leads to the clear perception of been clear and evident,—the suspicions of the other men's motives, especially when they druggist might have remained unshaken, and strive to conceal themselves amongst the dark he might have conceived that Maillotin du and tortuous paths of policy. He was, certainly, sometimes wrong in his calculations, of betraying the schemes of vengeance which but was not often so; and, in the present in-his incautious indignation might breathe, to stance, by placing himself exactly in the the ears of those who had refused mercy to his situation of the druggist, and conceiving what child. But the Prévôt, appreciating and redifference of character, he arrived at a very correct conclusion, in regard to the designs to the obstacles which might impede them from acting together.

One great difficulty, indeed, would have lain in his way on almost any other occasion; for so accustomed was he both to see others attempt to deceive him, and to deceive others himself in return, that he could scarcely deal straightforwardly with any one. As he was now perfectly sincere, however, in his desire of aiding the druggist's revenge, or rather of in the mind of the Prévôt towards this statesaccomplishing his own through that of Ganay, he could afford to be candid on the present occasion. All that obstructed their cordial co-operation arose in those doubts and fears of each other, which all villains, however bold, must naturally feel on leaguing themselves together for an evil purpose; and such jealousies were undoubtedly felt strongly by the Prévôt and his companion.

Nevertheless, these difficulties were to be got over. The doubts and suspicions were soon very frankly avowed; for as eachthough with certain modifications-considered cunning or shrewdness as the height of human wisdom, and, consequently, of human virtue, vanity itself naturally taught them to display rather than to conceal the prudent circumspection with which they guarded against any danger from each other.

We cannot here detail the whole conversation that ensued; but, in the first instance, the druggist made himself master of all the circumstances which acted as incentives to revenge, in the mind of Maillotin du Bac, against the Lord of Imbercourt, before he committed himself further. By many a keen question, he induced him to unveil, step by step, the manner in which, through many years, that nobleman had thwarted his designs, and incurred his displeasure; how he had cut him off from reward and honour where he had striven for it by dishonourable means; how he had defended the innocent against his persecution; how he had sternly overturned from his own house? many of his best laid schemes, and exposed some of his most subtle contrivances, from a Maillotin du Bac; 'good faith, you must period of many years before, up to the day in take some other road.' which his testimony had freed Albert Maurice would have been his own feelings under such vering his suspicions, recapitulated every event circumstances, with a little allowance for the with cool, bitter exactness, and dwelt upon the various circumstances with a precision that showed how deeply they were impressed and the wishes of his companion, as well as upon his memory. He added, too, a slight glimpse of interested motives, by showing how Imbercourt had stood in the way of his advancement, and how he might be profited in his own office, if that nobleman were removed, by any means, from the councils of Burgundy.

The impression thus left upon the mind of the burgher-and it was a correct one-was, that there was a long store of treasured hatred man, Imbercourt, aggravated by thwarted ambition and avarice; and that he had reached that point at which he was ready to run considerable risks for the gratification of his vengeance and the promotion of his interest. As to any moral sentiment standing in the way, it was an objection which neither the Prévôt nor the druggist ever dreamed of. Those were ties from which each felt that the other was free, and therefore they were never taken into consideration.

After a long conversation had brought them to this mutual state of good understanding, and after the druggist had pretty plainly pointed out that, before proceeding with any of the deeper and more intricate schemes, which might place the life of each in the power of the other, he should expect that the Prévôt would join with him in some act which, though less dangerous, would give him a hold upon that officer, which at present he did not possess, he went on with the calmness of intense but subdued feelings.

'By the sentence of the Eschevins,' he said, in a low, quiet tone, which was, perhaps, more impressive than even his former bursts of passion, 'by the sentence of the Eschevins, Sir Prévôt, the body—you understand me the body is to hang in chains over the Ypres gate till such time as it is consumed by the wind, and the rain, and the foul birds of prey: will it not be sweet for a father's eyes to behold such a sight every time that he rides forth

'Ay; but would it not be a matter of trifrom the effects of the Prévôt's vindictive umph, rather than shame, replied the drugfind the body gone? In a word, would it not existence, and the chains which marked the be proud to show these paltry tyrants that even now they cannot work all their will? What! do you not understand me yet? I tidings of what had occurred soon spread would have my son's head laid in the calm ground, man: I would have the body of the thing I loved removed from the place of horror What say you? can it be and of shame.

'I understand you now,' replied the Prévôt; 'let me but think a moment, Master Ganay, -let me but think a moment. It can be done -ay, it can be done; but I should think it mattered little to one of your firm mind. The body will rot as soon in the holiest ground unholy air.

'Do I not know that?' demanded Ganay, with a curling lip. 'Think you that I ever dream of angels or devils, or all the absurd fancies that monks and priestly quacks have built up, on the wild vision of an hereafter? No, no! but I would fain disappoint the tyrants, and teach them that they cannot do all. I would fain, too, remove the memento of my house's shame from before the eyes of my fellow-citizens. Can it be done, I say?'

'It can; it can!' replied Maillotin du Bac; 'and, to please you, it shall be done. Hie tion, is still to be heard at the firesides of the you away straight to the churchyard of the citizens of Ghent. Minnims, with some one you can trust bearing pickaxe and shovel. Use my name, and the porter will soon let you in. Wait there till I come, and busy the man you take with you in digging a trench. Be quick; for it will take long. I go upon my errand; and will be there in about two hours. After this, Master Ganay, I think we may trust each other. So we will meet again to-morrow night, at this hour; and, if I mistake not, we will soon find means to crush the viper that has stung us both.

The druggist replied not a word, but wrung the hand that the Prévôt had given him hard in his own, and suffered him to depart.

It were needless to trace further the proceedings of that night, or to give any more detailed explanations in regard to the events just mentioned, than to say, that early the following morning a party of children and women assembled before the Ypres gate, to gaze,-with that fondness for strange and rejected them as false and malicious. fearful sights which often characterises that age and sex, -upon the body of young Karl by Maillotin du Bac, to the ears of the drug-Ganay, the rich druggist's son, who, after a short course of wild profligacy and vice, had been hanged for murder the day before, as the course of action to be pursued in case However much they might expect to have the tidings should prove true; which, as they their wonder excited, it was so in a greater calculated all the probabilities, and suffered degree, though in a different manner from their wishes in some degree to lead their that which they anticipated. There, on the judgments, they gradually persuaded themprojecting beam from which the unhappy selves was even more than likely. young man had been suspended, hung, in-gist, 'if I could ride through that gate, and deed, the rope which had terminated his additional turpitude of his offence, but the body itself was no longer there; and the

through the city.

Strict search was immediately instituted. The Eschevins, and other officers appointed by the Duke of Burgundy, were furious at their authority being set at nought, and both held out threats and offered rewards for the discovery of the body; but it was all in vain: and while some of the more malevolent-remembering the course of young Ganay's life, and into the hands of what Being it had appeared likely to cast him in the endthat ever priest or bishop blest, as in the wide accounted for the disappearance of his body, by supposing that the great enemy of mankind had carried it off as his due, others, more charitable, but not less superstitious, chose to believe that the father, by some drugs only known to himself, had found means to resuscitate his son, and had sent him away to some distant land, where his crimes and their punishment were equally unknown.

This version of the affair, indeed, obtained by far the most numerous body of supporters; and the tale, swollen and disfigured by tradi-

CHAPTER XIX.

THE FATAL BATTLE.

OTHER matters of more general interest occurred soon after the events we have narrated in the last chapter, and imperatively called the attention of the citizens of Ghent from the unhappy druggist and his son. Strange rumours of a battle fought and lost beneath the walls of Nancy circulated in the good town during the evening of the ninth of January. No one, however, could trace them to their source. No messenger had arrived in the city from the army of the Duke of Burgundy; and the wise and prudent amongst the citizens, after a few inquiries concerning the authority on which these reports rested,

They were borne, however, in the evening, gist Ganay: and the chance of such an event was eagerly canvassed between them, as well

Long and anxious were their deliberations;

three in the morning when the Prevot left the that in other men might have led to doubt dwelling of the rich merchant. It was a and question. At the same time the very clear, frosty night, with the bright small stars twinkling in thousands through a sky from which every drop of vapour and moisture seemed frozen away by the intense cold. The at such an hour of the night, instantly world was all asleep; and the sound of a footfall in the vacant streets was enough to make even the journeyer himself start at the noise his step produced, so still and silent was the whole scene. The sinking moon, though she still silvered over with her light the frostwork on the high roofs of the various buildtown, leaving no light but that which was diffused through the whole air by the general lightness of the sky, and the glistening white- him; and, stepping out of the shadow, as the ness of the ice upon the canals. There is cavalier approached, he exclaimed, Why, always something sublime and touching in the how now! what news, Paul Verdun? How aspect of a large city sleeping calmly in the long have you left the camp? moonlight of a clear quiet night, with all its good Providence of God. But the mind of Maillotin du Bac had reached that point of obduracy at which the sweetest or the most solemn, the most refreshing or the most awful of the pages in Nature's great monitory book Wrapping his cloak are equally unheeded. round him, to guard against the cold, he walked on, close to the houses, and turned into the first small narrow street that he found, in order that no watchful eye, if such existed, might trace him from the house of the druggist. Thence, again deviating into one of those lateral streets that lead along by the side of the principal ones, he continued his course over the stones, rendered black and dier. slippery by the intense frost.

ear, but every now and then the distant crowing of a cock heard through the clear air from the country beyond the walls. After a little, however, as the Prévôt walked on, he caught the tramp of a horse's feet sounding afar off, and, in a few minutes, the challenge of the sentries at the Alost gate, the clang of the portcullis, the fall of the drawbridge, a brief murmured conversation at the gate, and then again the sound of the horse's feet advancing at a slow pace-which the state of the pavement rendered necessary-down the replied the Prévôt.- Well, God send it a principal street. All this he heard clearly and distinctly; for the sound must have been small, indeed, which, in the calm still winter of their connection, especially as his official time over their cursed pottle-pots. Good-

and it was verging fast towards the hour of duties were always a fair excuse for conduct habits of his life gave him a propensity to investigate every occurrence, however slight, so that the sound of some one entering the city, attracted his attention, and his curiosity at once led him to take a short cut into the street down which the horseman was riding. It was one of those which, running nearly east and west, was still illumined by the pale light of the moon; and the eye of Maillotin du Bac, which never forgot the form that it ings, and poured a flood of mellow splendour had once rested upon, instantly perceived and down the long streets that led to the westward, recognised an armed cavalier riding towards cast the broad shadows of the principal build- him, whom he had known as a boon comings completely over all the other parts of the panion in the army of the Duke of Burgundy.

His resolution was instantly taken to accost

'Who the devil art thou?' was the first congregated thousands reposing beneath the reply of the cavalier, who appeared to have drunk fully more wine than was beneficial to his faculties of perception :- 'Who the devil art thou?-What! Master Prévôt?-give you good day-give you good day-night, that is to say: or day it may be, too; for, by my faith, it is after cock-crow. What! going your rounds?-Ever watchful, Master Prévôt, hey?-What news of the good city?'

'Nothing stirring - nothing stirring,' replied Maillotin du Bac: 'no news at all, except that the Eschevins hanged a man yesterday, without my help. But what news of the camp, I say; and how came you from it?'

' Ay, there is the mischief,' replied the sol-

'What! no new defeat?' interrupted Mail-All was still. Not a sound fell upon the lotin du Bac, his wish, very likely, being father to the thought.

'Defeat! No, no,-no defeat, man!' replied the soldier: 'never were we better. A glorious army-posted strongly,-the town almost reduced by famine, and nothing but a handful of raw Switzers come to relieve it. There will be a battle before many days are over; and Duke Charles will cut up the churls like mincemeat. But the mischief is, that I should be sent away before it is fought.

'So there has been no battle after all?' good issue, when it does come. - Good night, good friend: I must on upon my way.

'Good night !- good night !' replied the air of the night, did not reach his practised soldier:— faith, I must on my way too; for I have letters from the Duke, and from the He was now too far from the house of the Count de Chimay, for my good Lord of Imdruggist for his appearance in the streets, bercourt; and, somehow, I met with three even at that late hour, to lead to any suspicion good companions at Alost, who wasted my night !-good night !' and so saying, he rode girl herself, after dismounting in the court-rather that it had been something public, too, ret of York. if it had but been to wring his pride.' Thus horse were admitted into the court of the Lord of Imbercourt's hotel. The streets of Ghent resumed their solitude and silence; and the night between the ninth and tenth of January ended in peace.

on horseback, and proceeding towards the palace, at which Margaret Duchess of Burgundy, and sister to Edward King of England, had arrived the day before. The Princess Mary, too, was expected from the side of Bruges. But, nevertheless, two messengers the intelligence of an approaching battle, and recommended her immediate return to the city.

The news which had been brought by Paul Verdun, and the certainty that, at the time of his departure from the Burgundian camp. no battle had been fought, spread rapidly different individual with different feelings, as he was well or ill affected to the reigning family. The certainty, however, that an immediate struggle was about to take place between Charles the Bold and his determined and hitherto successful adversaries, the Swiss, of course kept the minds of the people of the city in a state of agitation and excitement,a state the most detrimental, morally and physically, that it is possible to conceive for any town or any people. Business was neglected, if not suspended; political gossipings supplied the room of activity and industry; anxiety, suspicion, and irritation took the place of calm labour and tranquil enjoyment; the slightest piece of news, whether false or true, was sought and received as a boon; the wildest tale found some to believe it; and a small lie, by the industrious augmentation of many, soon swelled into a mountain of falsehood.

Towards evening the Princess Mary arrived at the palace; and while the good people of Ghent proceeded to distort amongst themselves the news of her return in every different way that suited their fancies-some saying that she had come back with only a single squire, some that she had brought with her a attention. force of a thousand men at arms-that fair yard, together with exactly the same train 'Ha!' muttered the Prévôt, as he walked that had accompanied her during the whole onward towards his own dwelling: 'so-that course of her progress, ran lightly up the scheme is all vain, and we must try the other, wide flight of steps which conducted to the though it will be both difficult and dangerous apartments of her amiable stepdame, and in to get any one to give him the dose. I had a moment after was in the arms of Marga-

'Bless thee, my sweet child! bless thee!' muttering as he went, the Prévôt now trod said the fair Englishwoman, pressing her his way homeward. The soldier and his war- husband's daughter to her bosom: 'thou art come to comfort me; for I am very sad, and my heart is full of forebodings.

' Nay, nay, madam, never fear,' replied the Princess; 'you are sad and anxious because you know my lord and father is likely to risk No small activity was observable, however, a battle,—and I, of course, am anxious the next morning in the precincts of the court. too; but still we must not despond. Remem-By seven o'clock the Lord of Imbercourt was ber, madam, how often he has fought and conquered.'

'It is not for the battle that I fear,' replied Margaret of York : 'my early days, and my early recollections, have been, and are, of nothing but stricken fields, and battles lost and won; and the tidings of approaching strife were sent off, at different times, in that direction; and it was supposed that they bore her those who are on the spot give breath to doubts and suspicions which have sadly shaken my hopes, dear Mary. In a word, with the Duke's letters, received last night, came a despatch to the good Lord of Imbercourt from the Count de Chimay. He speaks very vaguely and doubtingly; but he evidently apprehends treasons, and as evidently points through the city, and was received by every to Campo Basso as the traitor, -your father's most trusted and favourite servant.

'I would fain see the letters,' replied the Princess: 'may I beseech you, madam, to let the Lord of Imbercourt be sent for?

The desire of the Princess was immediately obeyed; and, in a short time, Imbercourt returned to the palace. His words were few, and tended merely to express his congratulations on the Princess's safe return, without touching upon the fears which had been more openly spoken by the Duchess of Burgundy. There was, however, that degree of settled gloom upon his countenance, and a restless anxiety in his eye, which showed that his apprehensions perhaps were even greater than her own. He immediately laid before the Princess Mary the letters which he had received the night before, and which, as far as positive fact went, merely stated that the Burgundian army, in great force, lay in a strong position beneath the walls of Nancy; that a small army of Swiss and Germans were encamped opposite to them, and that a battle was likely soon to take place. The Duke's letter was short and general: that of the Count de Chimay was more particular; and Mary read over both with deep and eager

'There is much to fear,' she said, as she

May God defend us, and avert the dangers both in body and mind, lies in his weary that threaten !

Monsieur de Chimay, I acknowledge, madam, replied the Lord of Imbercourt; 'but I see nothing in that of our noble sovereign the Duke which should give us any apprehension.

alarm: But the Duchess instantly perceived words, as when I last saw him at Dijon. the cause of her hesitation, and exclaimed,- thought concealed from each other.'

ing in her eyes, - 'I must say I see more-far well to chide with any bitterness. But hark !' more—cause for apprehension in this letter she proceeded,—! what noise is that in the than in this,' and she laid her hand first upon court? For God's sake, my Lord of Imberthe letter of her father, and then upon that of court, look out and see! for since I took upon the Count de Chimay. 'The one, she pro- me the sad task of holding the reins, which ceeded, 'speaks vaguely of traitors to be feared require a far stronger hand than mine, I have in my father's camp; the other shows me met with so many sorrows and misfortunes, much cause to fear for my father himself.— that every sound alarms me.—Hark! there O, my lord!' she added, laying her left hand are many people speaking. upon the arm of Imbercourt, while, with her In obedience to her command, Imbercourt right, she pointed to a number of blots and approached the casement which opened above erasures, sentences begun and not finished, or the lesser court of the palace, and, throwing phrases entirely altered in the despatch from back a part of the lattice, he looked out upon a great alteration here? The time was when that his eyes fell upon was the form of the old the brief, clear sentences of Charles of Burlord of Neufchâtel, in the act of dismounting gundy, unstudied and rough though they from his horse by the aid of two stout attenmight sometimes be, proceeded at lonce to dants, whose dusty armour and jaded horses the point, without change or hesitation, and evinced that they, like their master, had tra-paper with a stern and mournful glance.

ing, I will set out to-morrow to see him and

but no smile accompanied her words; for sion of his countenance. that truth had been often felt too bitterly 'What is it, my lord?' she exclaimed during the course of her past life.—'I do in- 'speak boldly?—Are they again in revolt?' deed : but yet the only thing that can detain laid them down, in both these despatches. mehere while my father, ill at ease, and shaken leaguer before Nancy, is the doubt which is That there is much to fear in the letter of the superior duty-to join him there, or to remain in the situation in which he has placed

'Nay, nay, Mary,' said Margaret of York; uke which should give us any apprehen-on. You can trust my love for Mary raised her eyes with a timid glance both your father and yourself; and, as soon towards the face of Margaret of York, as if as may be, I will join him, though haply my fearful of giving her pain, or of increasing her coming unbidden may call on me some harsh 'Bear with him, dear lady! oh, bear with 'Speak, speak, dear Mary! let us not have a him!' replied Mary .-- 'It is but the haste of an impatient spirit chafed by unwonted re-Well, then, replied Mary, the tears start- verses. He knows the worth of your love too her father: - O, my lord! do you not see what was passing below. The first object expressed with force and precision the exact velled far and fast. The old nobleman him-meaning, which was too clear in his mind, self, however, displayed strong traces of battle ever to be doubtful in his words: but look at as well as wayfaring. His helmet was off, and that letter, my lord. - Did you ever see any- its place supplied by a small furred cap, from thing like that from the hand of the Duke be- underneath which a mingled mass of bandages and long gray hair, dabbled with dust and Imbercourt was silent, and gazed upon the blood, made its appearance; while his left arm, supported in a torn and soiled scarf, My lord, my lord!' continued Mary, showed that the fight had been severe ere he 'my father is ill; and, with Heaven's bless- left it.

Imbercourt at once guessed the event which he had come to communicate, well knowing 'Nay, lady,' replied Imbercourt, 'you that an aged and wounded cavalier would not must not forget that you are left here by your have been chosen as the messenger of victory: father, as his representative in Flanders; and and while, with slow and painful efforts, the indeed you must not quit your post. Before old lord dismounted, the counsellor withdrew you could arrive, too, a battle will have been from the window, doubting whether he should fought. I will yet trust that the noble Duke meet him on the stairs, and delay the tidings will win it gloriously; and you know him too that he bore, till Mary was more prepared to well to doubt, he added, with a faint smile, receive them, or whether he should suffer him 'that a battle won will do more to console to see the Princess, and let the shock pass him than the sweetest voice that ever whispered comfort in the ear of man.

'I do indeed,—I do indeed!' replied Mary; conflict in his mind by the changing expres-

'What is it, my lord?' she exclaimed; Who, madam?-the men of Ghent?' demanded Imbercourt, - 'Oh! no, no! nothing grief of mind, and pain, and exhaustion of the kind. It is apparently a wounded body. - 'Ah! had he but taken my advice,

- quick!' she exclaimed. worse than any tidings. Quick, my lord!

Imbercourt withdrew to obey; and while battle. Mary gazed with eager eyes upon the door, Margaret of York fixed her glance with melancholy interest on her fair step-daughter, more anxious for Mary of Burgundy-in whom she had found as much affection as she could have even for a husband, who had never greatly be childless. But a short time elapsed be- to blanch or my heart to fail. Say, how went tween the Lord of Imbercourt's departure this luckless day? and his return; but moments of apprehension would weigh down many long days of joy; and to Mary of Burgundy his absence seemed interminable. At length, however, he came, followed slowly by the old Lord of Neufchâseveral attendants.

'Better than many a better man, madam,' trous tidings he bore, than even of his corporeal sufferings; 'many a one lies cold that could fill the saddle now-a-days far better than old Thibalt of Neufchâtel.'

'Good God! then, what are your tidings?' cried Mary, clasping her hands. 'My father?

-speak, sir !-my father? 'Is well, I hope, lady,' replied the old soldier; 'but as for his army——'

'Stop, stop!' exclaimed the Princess: 'first thank God for that! But are you sure, my lord, that he is safe?'

'Nay, nay, I cannot vouch it, lady,' he re-officer bearing news from the army; and I and not that of either the black traitor, Campo Basso, or of Chimay, and such boys as that! Mary waved her hand .- Bid him hither! But, lady, I am faint and weary, for I have 'Suspense is ridden harder to bear you these news, though they be sad ones, and to bid you prepare all Bid him hither, without pause of idle cere- sorts of reinforcements to check the enemy, than ever I thought to ride from a field of

"But tell me, my lord,' said Margaret of York, stepping forward, as Mary, overwhelmed with the tidings, sat gazing, mournfully, in the face of the old soldier, while her mind was afar; 'but tell me, my lord, how expected from a child of her own bosom-than all this has happened. Speak, for I have a right to hear; and my ear, alas! has been, sought her love, and who had neglected her from the cradle, too much accustomed to the as soon as he found that she was destined to details of battle and bloodshed, for my cheek

'Faith, good madam, I must be short with my tale,' replied the Lord of Neufchâtel, 'for I know not how, but my breath fails me. My lord the Duke-God send him safe to Ghent! -had sworn by all the saints, that no house tel, unable, from wounds, and weariness, and of stone should ever cover his head till he had exhaustion, to walk without the support of slept in Nancy, which, as you know, we had besieged some days. The enemy, in Even anxiety conquered not the gentleness the meanwhile, lay over the water a league or of Mary's heart; and though she began to two beyond St. Nicholas, and day by day exclaim, as he entered, 'Well, my lord! increased in number, while day by day the Speak! she instantly paused, and continued, forces of the Duke fell off; for we had famine —Good God! you are sadly wounded, sir. and disease and, worse than all, traitors in Bring forward that chair; send for the the camp. But his grace would not be warned, chirurgeon of the household; sit you down, though many a one strove to warn him; and my Lord of Neufchâtel. How fare you at length, on the Sunday morning, just five days since, the Swiss and Lorrainers, with their German and French allies and Italian replied the old knight, more full of the disas- traitors, marched boldly up towards our camp. Faith! it was a fair sight to see them come in two great bodies-one by the river, and the other by the high road from Neufville. Churls though they were, they made a gallant array. So then they came on. But madam,' added, rising and supporting himself by the back of the chair, 'I love not to think of it! Good sooth! it makes my heart swell too wuch to tell the whole just now. We were soon hand to hand-the artillery roaring, bolts and arrows and balls flying, the trumpets braying, and the men-at-arms charging gallantly. But still, as I looked round, I saw plied; 'his army, however, is no more. Fatal, the ranks of Burgundy wax thin; and still the most fatal, has been the Duke's determina- Swiss churls pushed on; and I saw many a tion. All is lost in the field. The army of stout soldier fall, and many that had fought Burgundy is, as I have said, no more; and well turn his back. Well, as I was thinking where the Duke is, I cannot say, though I what might best be done, my lord the Duke saw him galloping towards the left when I rode up; and, speaking softly as a woman, quitted the field, which was not amongst he said, -" My good old friend, I pray you the first. Ah! had he but taken my adjoin De Lalaing, and, with your men-at-arms vice! he added, with a rueful shake of the make one good charge upon the flank of head; a slight touch of natural vanity obtrudyonder boors." It was soon done and over. ing itself, even then, in the midst of sincere We went down like the shot of a mangonel, but we were driven back like the same shot Before he reached it, however, he paused, and when it bounds off from a wall of stone. One turning round, exclaimed, - 'Faith! I had churl shivered my helmet, and nearly split my forgot the very errand which made me make skull with his two-handed sword. Another such haste; for I have travelled with scarcely shot me in the arm with his hand-gun. All an hour's rest, in order to bid you take instant my poor fellows but two died around me measures to secure the country, for that wild bravely; and they who were left took my young wolf of Lorraine will be upon the fron-horse by the bridle, and were carrying me off, tier speedily; and even as I passed by Brus-when, by our Lady, I saw one of the base sels I heard strange tales of movements in Italians who had betrayed us all, despatching France. You, my Lord of Imbercourt, look my poor Squire Walter as he lay tumbled from to it with all speed; for, believe me, not an his horse upon a little mound. He had served hour is to be lost. with me in nine stricken fields, and many a chance affray; he had never quitted me for while Imbercourt advanced to the Princess, more than twenty years, so I could not quit and besought her to be comforted. She anhim then. No, lady, no! but shaking the swered nothing, however; and only by a bridle from their hands that would have stayed melancholy wave of the hand, expressed how me, I turned me round, and struck one more deep were her apprehensions. good stroke for Burgundy. But the poor lad 'Nay, Mary, my sweet child,' said the was dead! God have his soul, the poor lad Duchess, 'give not way to despair; remember good stroke for Burgundy. But the poor lad dashed the tear from his eye with the back of all, and rules all, for the best. his brown hand.

time the battle had changed to a flight and a pursuit. There were not ten men who held turns his back while one hope lasts; but no shame to him who flies from a lost field. saw the Duke galloping to the left; and as I knew the country well, I spurred for the bridge of La Buissière, and sad it was to see the road all strewed with dead and dying. But when I came near the bridge, the matter was still worse; for there was that foul traitor, Campo* Basso, with a barricade of carts and waggons, were circumstances in the situation of the cutting off the fugitives from his betrayed master's host. When I looked forward, there were the Italian devils -when I looked behind, down were coming the German swine; on the deep and heavy gloom fell over him from the one hand was the hill, with the Swiss pikes gleaming over the top, and on the other was the river. The water afforded the only chance; so in we plunged. Our horses were strong and many a gallant gentleman sunk close before our eyes. But, lady,' he added, once more, as the excitement of detailing the battle passed your Grace's leave, I will retire.

Mary answered not a word, but gazed upon the old man with the same fixed painful glance; but the Duchess bowed her head,

* This fact is undoubted, and indeed the whole account of the battle of Nancy here given is confirmed by Jean Molinet, Historiographer to Mary of Burgundy. The writer of this book, however, would have omitted this narration of events, which have been so admirably detailed elsewhere, had it not been absolutely necessary to his story.

Thus saying, he turned and left the chamber, was dead!' and, as he spoke, the old knight there is a God of mercy above us, who sees

Mary of Burgundy cast her fair arms round 'Little is there more to tell, madam,' he her stepmother, and exclaiming, 'My father! proceeded, after a moment's pause. 'By this Oh, my father!' burst into a passionate flood of tears.

'Leave us, my Lord of Imbercourt,' said together on the field. Shame to him who the Duchess. 'Let me beseech you to take all the measures necessary for our security; and send out messengers to gain more intelligence of this sad defeat. Call those whom you can best trust to council; and, for God's sake, suffer not your mind to be overcome at the moment that all its energies are most required.

Imbercourt bowed and withdrew; but there country which rendered it impossible for him to act or think with that calm tranquillity which he had displayed at other times. A first moment that the loss of the fatal battle of Nancy met his ear; and he never seemed wholly to recover his former energies.

He took care, however, to summon to the unwounded, and we struggled through, though side of the Princess, in her hour of need, all those who, he thought, might best give her both consolation and support. Messengers were instantly despatched to the Lord of away, 'I am growing faint again, and in good Ravestein, the Duke of Cleves, the Bishop of sooth I have little more to tell; therefore, by Liege, and several others, whose relationship to the house of Burgundy afforded the best security for their taking an interest in its fate; and Imbercourt endeavoured, as far as possible, to increase the military force within the and the Lord of Neufchâtel, with the aid of town of Ghent, without exciting the watchful his two attendants, moved towards the door. jealousy of the inhabitants; but the country was totally drained of men, and few, if any, could be added at a short notice to the force within the town-at least, few of those feudal troops on which alone reliance could be placed.

In the meanwhile, during the evening and the early part of the night which followed the arrival of the Lord of Neufchâtel, post after post came in from the side of Alost and Brussels, bringing new details and rumours of the battle; and each additional fact proved it to calling rapidly at the liouses of five or six of have been more disastrous and bloody than it thad appeared at first. Nothing was heard but long lists of the dead, or exaggerated computations of the total loss. Still, there crowds began to disperse—a considerable considerable of the Duke him—number returning home early to discuss with passed the night in that gloomy apprehension, which is perhaps more racking to the heart than absolute sorrow.

insisted upon hearing the tidings that every post brought in, with that anxious eagerness which showed that a spark of hope, however faint, still remained alive within her bosom; tidings that might still arrive. but with her, and indeed with every one else, as fresh news arrived, as the accounts of the stern determination evinced by the Duke before the battle were multiplied, and as his often reiterated declaration that he would never quit the field alive, was repeated, the conviction of his death became more and more complete.

In the meanwhile, the people of the city, collecting in eager and anxious crowds in the streets, especially towards the Brussels gate, canvassed in low tones the events that had taken place. As one horseman after another entered the town, still some individual would start out to accost him, and running by his side as he rode on, would gather from him whatever information he would afford, and then return to tell it to the groups, whose comments on the past were seldom unconnected with some of those whispered apprehensions for the future, which, like the low moanings of the rising wind, generally give notice of a coming storm long before it is ready to fall upon the earth.

CHAPTER XX.

THE REVOLT OF GHENT,

IT was remarked as an extraordinary fact, that during the whole course of that evening, -an evening of the greatest excitement and anxiety, perhaps, that Ghent had ever known, -not one of the principal and most influential citizens was seen in the streets of the city. of the lower classes; and those amongst them, who were supposed to be the most knowing was a deep silence in regard to the Duke him-self. No one knew what had befallen him in their wives and families, the news they had the fight or the pursuit; and no one ventured collected in the town, and to acquire that to assert, what all internally believed, that he degree of domestic importance which a budget had fallen upon that bloody plain. The very of strange tidings is always sure to impart to failed upon that bloody plain. The tay of standard transfer of the inmates of the ducal dwelling in Ghent ing groups thus separated at length—the intense cold driving even the most persevering to the shelter of their own homes, as the night advanced-and only one or two idle young Mary wept her father as dead; but yet she men, who could boast some acquaintance with the soldiers on guard at the Brussels gate, remained after nine o'clock within the warm refuge of the guard-house, waiting for any

> The many varied scenes, the continued presence of danger, the frequent breaking short of ties and affections, have all a natural tendency to render the heart of an old soldier, in some degree, callous and indifferent to events which agitate and affect younger and fresher minded men. It was wonderful to hear with what calm composure the veterans in the guard-house talked over the events which had spread grief and dismay through the palace, and excitement and alarm in the city. Although they all loved and admired the character of Charles the Bold, for the very lion-hearted qualities which had led him to attempt impossible enterprises, and to rush upon certain defeat; yet they canvassed his conduct with calm and somewhat contemphad been gored by the boar. Why the devil did he set down before Nancy, in the middle of winter?' cried one: 'he might have known very well that nobody would stay with him, looking at stone walls, in a frost like this.

tuous examination, and spoke of his probable death in the same terms that they might be supposed to use in talking of a hound which

'Ay, ay, but he did worse than that!' replied another: 'why did he trust to a set of Italian hirelings, when he had good subjects of his own?'

'Why, old lions,' rejoined a third, 'will. they say, grow both suspicious and obstinate.

'Full time, then, that they should get their throats cut,' answered the first: 'but I know old Charlie well; and I will bet a flagon of Beaune to a flask of sour Rhenish, that he never left the field of Nancy. No. The groups which collected were altogether no; he had had enough of running away; and sure I am that he died like a stag at bay. Well, I am almost sorry that I was not with in the policy of the higher burghers, could him, though a warm guard-house and a bringing more news, I warrant,

While one soldier, according to the request of the other, ran across the street to seek thrown down and tied by those who held matter for the potations with which they pro- him, while a number of others made their posed to conclude the night, his senior pro- way into the guard-house. The soldiers there ceeded to the gate, where, the portcullis being were already upon their feet; and the captain raised, and the drawbridge let down, a cava- of the watch was starting forward to light the lier immediately rode in, whom he addressed match of his arquebuse at the lantern which have gone as far as Alost since you rode out.'

steaming like a quagmire with hard riding. 'Well, what news?-what news?' cried the other,- 'you must have heard some tidings.' 'Nothing new at all,' replied the Prévôt : 'all is stale as a miser's cheese;—a battle fought and lost; men dead, but not buried; the army dispersed, and every one gone God knows where. - Good-night, good-night!' and so saying, he rode on. But it is remarkable, that though his horse was evidently ready to drop with fatigue, he did not, at first, take druggist Ganay.

In the meantime the soldiers in the guardhouse discussed the contents of the flagon, of Ghent,' replied the stranger, with which their messenger returned; sharing contestable right and privilege it has been, in it liberally with the two or three young all ages, to mount guard on the walls, and at artisans whom they had permitted to remain the gate of our own city; which privilege, at their post. With what had been drunk before, the contents of the gallon pot which Charles, is no less valid than before that act. was now brought over was sufficient—not- Give up your arms, then, quietly, and no withstanding the fact of its being shared with harm shall befall you.' the citizens-to obfuscate, in some degree, the intellects of the soldiery; and, after captain of the watch, 'we must have authorhaving given their civil companions a some- ity from our superior officers. As you well what unceremonious notice to go home, they know, the commander for the night is at the cast themselves down upon the straw which Ypres gate; send to him, and we will obey was provided for their accommodation during his commands.' the night, and soon forgot everything else, 'You seek, sir, to gain time,' replied the under the influence of the drowsy god. The other; 'but it is in vain. The walls and the sentry without, who had been ordered to gates are now in our hands. Our sentinels watch well, of course felt a greater inclination are mounted everywhere; and each military to sleep than ordinary, which was increased post which had been unlawfully placed by the by the cold; and, in spite of various vigorous Duke of Burgundy, throughout the city of efforts to keep himself awake, by walking Ghent, has been disarmed before we came rapidly up and down, dropping the end of hither. Yield, therefore, with a good grace, his partizan upon the ground, and several for yield you must; and as no blood has other little experiments of the same kind here shed already nity, it were to begin other little experiments of the same kind, he been shed already, pity it were to begin found himself, from time to time, nodding now. most refreshingly under the shelter of the high arch which spanned over the gate.

pottle-pot are better, at any time, in a frosty How long this state of things had continued pottie-pot are better, at any time, in a frosty night, than the cold ground and a bloody none of the soldiers knew, when suddenly the night-cap. Hie thee over, Bon-temps, to the vintner's at the corner, and fill the flagon with the best thou canst get for that broad piece. By my faith! we will have a carouse to the hold Lion of Burgundy, be he living or dead, and then we will go sleep.—Hie thee over, while a vintner's at the corner, and fill the flagon with the best thou canst get for that broad piece. By my faith! we will have a carouse to the himself pinioned by a number of powerful men, while a stern voice, backed by a naked sword at his throat, commanded him to be while I undo the gate, for there is some one blowing his horn,—a new post from Alost, stance at least to his duty, without a moment's consideration, the soldier shouted loudly. consideration, the soldier shouted loudly,-'To arms! to arms!' But he was instantly with, - 'Ha! Master Prévôt; you can never hung against the wall, when a powerful man, rushing in, closed with him, and, throwing 'By my faith! I have, though,' replied him violently back, interposed between him and Maillotin du Bac; 'look at my breast,—he is the light. A dozen more persons, completely armed, poured into the building; and more than one stern voice commanded the four soldiers which it contained to lay down their arms at once.

'Who, in the fiend's name, are ye, my masters?' exclaimed the captain of the watch: 'let us hear that, before we put down our arms, at all events:' and while he spoke he made impatient signs to one of his companions to get out of the small window, and give the alarm: but this scheme was frushis way towards his own dwelling, but directed trated by the same tall, powerful figure which his course towards the house of the little had before prevented him from lighting his match.

> 'We are the officers of the burgher guard 'whose inthough it was ursurped from us by the Duke

'Before we do that, good sir,' replied the blood of my own, or of other men, could it soldiery had everywhere been surprised and prove of service. But four can hardly cope disarmed.

'Well, sir!-well!' replied the captain of the watch: 'you say right in that, at least;

prisoners, sir.

Albert Maurice, for he it was who spoke ;to pass freely out. As our fellow-citizens through the solitary streets, not a little re-arrive, let all the posts be doubled. Now, joiced to find, by the stillness of the whole good Master Ganay,' he added in a whisper, join me quickly at my house. It wants but four preserved. No one had arrived when he hours to daybreak; and ere the sun rises we again crossed the threshold of his own door; have as much to do as would take lazy states- and whispering a few hasty orders to the sermen full many a month. I go round by the vant who admitted him, in regard to sadwestern magazine, to secure, if possible, the dling horses, and preparing trustworthy messtores and artillery. But be quick, for now sengers, he entered the chamber where he despatch is everything.

plished without difficulty. The magazine eyes with his hand, and abandoned himself was but scantily guarded; and the sleeping for a moment to deep thought. More than soldiers were surprised at that post as easily one pang crossed his heart, as he contemas the others had been at the guard-houses. plated the future; but he smothered them The gates, the defences, and all the principal instantly: and, banishing regret, he directed military stations, were now in the hands of the whole powers of his mind to consider the the people; and Albert Maurice hastened the best means for obtaining that object for home to meet a few individuals, selected from which he had now irrevocably determined to the most influential citizens, on whose con-struggle. sent, and with whose aid, he proposed to assert the ancient privileges of the city of which he yielded himself, that Ganay and Ghent, as the first step to those grander several others entered the apartment without his own mind.

So rapid had been the determination and the movements of the young citizen, through all that night-so prompt and successful all his measures—that even Ganay, stirred up by revenge and hatred, and guided by consummate cunning and shrewdness, had been left far behind. Where he had expected to be obliged to urge and suggest, he found himself at once compelled to follow and obey; and, yielding readily to a mind that he felt to first that are most easily determined. Citizens be far superior, he had been hurried through of Ghent! are ye not resolved to recover the a series of actions in a few hours, which he had contemplated before, indeed, but from you by the unholy hand of power?' which he had contemplated as the work of many days, and long and difficult intrigues.

Between ten at night and three in the the Prévôt, had formed his determination at once, had arranged his plans with prompt decision, had assembled the ancient burgher guard in force in his court-yard, by a few brief 'Well, then, by this time,' added the and striking words had explained to them young citizen, 'four strong horses stand his views and his schemes, had carried all saddled ready to set out; and four trustvoices in his favour; and, finally, had seized worthy messengers are prepared to bear to

though I should be willing enough to shed palace, without bloodshed, while the regular

with twenty; therefore, ground your arms, His last effort upon the magazine, the one my men, and give them up. We are your of the greatest importance, had been effected, His last effort upon the magazine, the one as sometimes happens, with more ease, than 'You have done wisely, soldiers,' said attempts that had seemed less difficult; and, leaving the citizens who had accompanied 'take their arms, my friends, but suffer them him, to guard that post, he hastened home city, that the silence and caution which had gather together the men we named, and been enjoined in the first instance was still was about to meet his fellow-citizens, and The purpose of Albert Maurice was accom- casting himself back in a chair, covered his

So deep, so intense were the thoughts to plans of general emancipation, which yet his perceiving their presence; and it was remained but vague and undefined even in only the voice of the druggist, demanding if he slept, that roused him from his reverie.

'Sleep!' he exclaimed, starting up; 'no, no! Who could sleep on such a night as this? Welcome, my friends, welcome! Each sit down, I pray; others will soon be here; but it is not fitting that of the few hours which are given us for action, even one minute should be wasted in waiting for any man. Some things need long council; in others, little can be risked. Let us choose those liberties and privileges which have been torn

'We are! We are!' replied a number of stern voices around.

'Is it not requisite, then,' continued Albert morning, the young citizen had received, from Maurice, 'that you should call your brethren the druggist himself, the certainty of the of the other good towns of Flanders and Duke of Burgundy's death, as obtained by Brabant to join with and support you, in asserting the rights of all?'

'Beyond all doubt! let it be done!' replied the rest.

every military post in the town, except the Brussels, Ypres, Bruges, and Louvain, our request that the worthy burghers of those great else could interpose to give a wrong direction towns will send us deputies to give force to to their efforts. our proceedings. My letters, written nearly so at a moment's warning. The gates are now in our hands; shall the messengers set out?'

'The sooner they depart the better!' was the universal reply; and a few lines hastily penned to each of the cities, were despatched without farther delay.

they produce combinations which defy pre- has now descended to a young and gentle vious calculation: and besides that fact, lady, who, if her counsellors be good ——' there is something in the very change of poa large body, which alters the characters of the persons themselves. Some, singly bold, are timid in a multitude; and some cowardly as individuals become even rash when supported by numbers.

Albert Maurice trusted to himself, however, to give the impress of his own mind to all the them to rule the people also; but he well knew that the task before him would be to did a country, justly or unjustly, rise against vent neighbouring princes from interfering the power that previously) ruled it, without while we obtain our liberty—and will at once it up originally designed.

determined to address them, before anyone of the more moderate of the citizens; 'I hear

'Men of Ghent,' he said, 'may I crave your patience for a moment? six months ago, when the battle of Morat Certain news has just been received by our was lost and won, have prepared them to do friend and fellow-citizen here present, -and he pointed to the druggist, - ' that in this last and fatal battle, wherein he staked his country's welfare and shed his people's blood in an unjust quarrel, Charles Duke of Burgundy has paid the forfeit of his obstinacy and ambition with his life. Now, men of Ghent, who is Before all this was completed, a number of there amongst us that does not feel that our other citizens had arrived; and the chamber rights have been infringed, our privileges was almost full. Every where were to be seen usurped, and our liberties trampled on, by men with faces pale from anxiety and excite- him who has gone to give an account of all ment. Some armed in hasty guise, with such the wrongs he has so boldly committed? We armour as could be caught up in a moment; all know it, and we all feel it; and there is some with their night gear scarcely laid aside; not an artisan, however humble, in all Ghent and each, as he entered, gazing round upon -nay, in all Flanders-that is not preparing the rest, with half wild and somewhat fearful to take arms to vindicate the freedom of our glances, as the light of the lamps dazzled their native land. That freedom, citizens, we may eyes, on entering from the dark streets without. Gradually, however, as they beheld a nation join heart and hand in asserting its number of friends and acquaintances all gathered together in the same cause as themeorem. But, oh! my friends, let us beginned the helders which was desired from selves, the boldness which men derive from ware-let us be cautious-let us be wise-let union began to spread amongst them. Every us be just—let us be merciful. Those who one present had long before been prepared, in some degree, for such events as were now would guide a stirred-up people through a in some degree, for such events as were now would guide a stirred-up people through a successful insurrection, must be calm as well as zealous. The to look to Albert Maurice as the man from whose voice and conduct the rest of the citizens were likely to take their tone, he had rein, or they will pass far beyond the golden taken care to ascertain the individual senting of each one, whom he now called to consult with him. in a moment of such ex-selves a great and an awful responsibility; and consult with, him, in a moment of such ex- selves a great and an awful responsibility; and igency. He well knew, indeed, that it is by every drop of unnecessary blood that is shed no means a necessary result, that the conduct in this great effort, will cry loudly to Heaven of a large body of men can be judged by the for vengeance on the head of the rash men personal opinions of each. The shades of who caused or suffered it to flow. The sway thought and character in different men are so of all that vast and wealthy land which lately infinite, that, when united, as in multitudes, rested in the hand of Charles, called the Bold,

'We will give her good counsellors!' cried sition, from an isolated station to a place in some one beside him; but Albert Maurice proceeded,-'Who, if her counsellors be good, will, at our petition, not only restore to us our rights and privileges, but will give us some security that they shall never be infringed again. But let us do nothing harshly. Let us proceed mildly and legally, though firmly; and first petition, as good and faithful subproceedings of the great burghers, and through jects, for the redress of our wrongs, before we proceed to obtain it by our own right hands. Such moderation, my friends, will gain us the restrain rather than to excite; for never yet love and support of all good men-will pregoing infinitely farther than those who stirred serve best our cause, and satisfy the conscience of the most scrupulous.' As soon as he perceived that all whom he had 'Methinks, Master Albert Maurice, you called were present, the young citizen at once have already begun pretty boldly,' said one 'That, sir, was done,' replied Albert Maurice, 'solely for our own security; and had it not been done, our meeting now, or our petitions hereafter, unsupported by any power of our own, would have been utterly fruitless;it was done to prevent the Princess from being carried away from us before our liberties were secure; it was done to prevent the introduction of large forces into this town before we were prepared to bid them defiance; and in doing it, we only asserted and resumed the guard their own walls and gates,-a right which had been long unjustly usurped.'

'It was wisely done! it was nobly done!' cried a number of voices, in the midst of which Ganay the druggist stepped forward, and said,—' Friends and fellow-citizens! all here present are bearers of high offices in the several trades, and members of the great Commune of Ghent; but we are meeting without form or order. Let us resolve ourselves into a city; and as president thereof I here propose him, whose able conduct, whose patriotic zeal, and whose prompt activity, has already success.

A murmur of applause followed, which soon rose into a loud and unanimous assent to the proposal. Nor did Albert Maurice affect to jects on which the feelings and passions of decline an office which he had previously determined to assume. His thanks he ex-pressed with manly eloquence, and assured his fellow-citizens, with the convincing voice of true feeling, that the liberty and prosperity of his native land should ever be the dearest restrain the passion from bursting forth. The old man, one of the fathers of the city, rose up, and addressed the young citizen. With a banish from its tones anything like personal slight touch of the monitory garrulity of old rancour, -- 'I second the proposal. Are we age, -at least, most of those who heard him all agreed?' thought it to be such, -he offered a word or two of caution to the young man who had taken upon him so bold and high a part. my proposal too. Listen to me, men of Ghent. 'He would not,' he said, 'urge him to be Our rights are our own-inherent-unchangemore moderate in his views, for he seemed to able-which the voice of no despot can wring feel the necessity of moderation already; but from us-which his power may hold in abeyhe would warn him, in the course that was ance, but which it can never destroy-which, before him, -a course, the turns and circum- when even suspended, still exist in full force, stances of which none could yet tell,-to be- and render everything that is done in opposiware of his own passions-to guard against tion to them unjust, illegal, criminal. I thereambition, or revenge, or love; for he was fore call upon you solemnly to arraign and to young and ardent: and that heart must be condemn those men, who, chosen from oureither very cold or very strong, which could selves by the late despot, Charles, became resist the influence of some mighty passion, the instruments of his tyranny against their when under the excitement of great events.'

his endeavours.

that the gates and walls of the city have tion, and felt, more deeply than he suffered to guard, and the soldiers have been dis-gramed. guard the soldiers have been dis-gramed. out of season. The old burgher perceived this feeling, and, breaking off quickly, went on with the more immediate matter before them. 'It is evident, Master Albert Maurice,' he said, 'that you have thought over all these events long and deeply, before this night; and, indeed, who is there amongst us who has not so thought? What, then, is the result of your consideration? What is the first step that you advise us to take?

'This,' replied Albert Maurice,- 'to meet immemorial right of the citizens of Ghent to to-morrow early, at the town-house, and there to prepare a petition, at once condoling with the Princess on the events which have placed the government in her hands, and beseeching her to listen to the voice of her own heart, and spontaneously to restore, to the good towns of Flanders, those rights and privileges of which her father had deprived them. Especially, let us entreat her, in the first instance, to do away with that false and illegal body of men, which, under her father's juriscouncil, as a temporary government of the diction, and by his appointment, administered in this city—not justice—but the arbitrary will of the Prince; and to give us back our true and legitimate magistrates, chosen by ourconducted us, thus far, with triumphant selves from amongst ourselves, to dispense our own laws to us and to our children.

While the full mellow voice of the young citizen touched so pointedly upon those subthe druggist Ganay were so highly excited, the eye of the unhappy father flashed like a living fire, and a small bright red spot gathered in the centre of his sallow cheek, while his lip quivered as if he could scarcely wish of his heart, and the principal object of moment that Albert Maurice had done speaking, he started up from his seat, and exclaimed As soon as this subject was discussed, an in a quick, sharp, discordant voice, which trembled with the very effort that he made to

'We are,' echoed the conclave.
'Now I,' continued Ganay, 'must offer own countrymen. The twenty-six men, falsely Though Albert Maurice listened with atten- calling themselves magistrates of Ghent,- appointed, not by the people of Ghent, according to ancient law and usage, but by the Duke ment goes,' replied Albert Maurice. of Burgundy, contrary to all our inclinations would show more rigorous justice towards and consent,—have, for nearly ten years, pre- men who, perhaps, have been somewhat severe sumed to rule and judge, and doom to punishing the discharge of their office, than I would, ment, and shed blood, within the walls of but that it is clear that the citizens of Ghent this city; for which, as traitors, oppressors, formally consented to their nomination by and murderers, unjustified in their proceed-the Duke, and, therefore, that, during his ings by any law or right, I claim their death, life, they were acting at least under legal as the just punishment for their crimes, and authority. a due warning unto others in the time to come.'

As he spoke, his whole frame trembled with the angry passion that was burning at day of this month, and three days after his his heart. His words flowed rapidly and death, my child was butchered by men whose clear; and his bright dark eyes, flashing from only title to authority had ceased. The cry beneath his heavy-knitted brow, offered the of blood must and shall be heard; and if it very picture of eloquent revenge. A murmur be notof doubtful import spread through his auditory, -some carried away by his passionate in so low a tone, that no one distinguished its oratory—some unwilling to begin their course import. Albert Maurice, however, saw the with such a sweeping act of severity. Albert necessity of conciliating him; well knowing Maurice himself, sympathising deeply with the influence he possessed over the minds of the feelings of the childless father, yet resolved, many whose support was absolutely requisite upon every principle of reason and right, to to success in their undertaking. He now also oppose a proposition which, he well knew, began to experience how difficult is the task proceeded rather from the spirit of revenge of binding into one mass a large body of men, will never do. Good God! my fellow citi- anything to be refused him, however unzens, shall it be hereafter said that the people reasonable his request. But he had yet to of Ghent rose up powerfully in defence of learn that the enchanter's wand, that stilled their own liberties, and made their first act the very angry seas themselves, would wave the slaughter of six-and-twenty defenceless in vain over the unbridled passions of manmen, who had been acting under the belief kind. that they were justified by the law? If any one was to blame, it was the Duke Charles, seeing the impression which had been made not they; and good sooth, I doubt that, at upon a great part of the burghers by the certhe worst, you could prove that they did not tain fact that the druggist's son had been conlegally hold their posts; for, by my faith ! we demned and executed after the Duke's death, all consented that the Duke should appoint - the case you mention is one totally disthem, when we thought he was going to hang tinct from any of the rest, and must be conus all. A cheap bargain we thought it then, sidered and judged of apart. Doubt not you when he was at our gates with ten thousand shall have full justice done you; and the day men. But even were it not so, and had we after to-morrow we will assemble in our pubso much has already flowed to no purpose? sultations with any point on which there may aright?'

' Most wisely, sir, as far as my poor judg-

'But not after his death!' cried Ganay. 'Charles Duke of Burgundy died on the fifth

Whatever the druggist added was muttered than a sense of justice,—paused between his without any power over them, but that which contending feelings; when, to the surprise of all, good Martin Fruse raised up his portly person, and, with one of those bursts of generous indignation, which sometimes rendered him almost eloquent, opposed himself sources of disunion in assemblies where, as in strongly to the course suggested by his friend the druggist. 'No, no!' he exclaimed; 'no, no! that consequence to the schemes of the rest, for

'Master Ganay,' replied the young citizen, not consented, should we be the first to make lic hall, and solemnly debate on what course widows and orphans in our own city? we must pursue in that respect. In the mean-Should we shed more Flemish blood, when while, let us not embarrass our present con-Should we punish men for actions in which be a difference of opinion; -morning will they believed there was no offence? Fie! soon be here. Our proceedings, then, are fie! Take from them their offices; reprove thus far determined :- first, to petition the them for having so far betrayed their country, Princess for restoration of our rights: if she as to accept the post they held from one who grant them, well; but if by evil counsellors had no right to give it; and let them go back she be persuaded to refuse, then to assert them to their dwellings to mourn over their fall. with our blood and with our fortunes, till the What say you, my fair nephew? do I judge last man amongst us perish! Am I right? Well, then, proceeded Albert Maurice, as a hall; and, in the meantime, friends and fel- struggle between the people and the throne, low-counsellors of the good city of Ghent, guarding and safety of the town?'

'You have! you have!' was the general reply; 'and now good night.'

One by one the counsellors of the town of Ghent departed from the apartment of the young citizen. But Ganay, the druggist, lingered behind the rest. The conversation between him and Albert Maurice was brief and rapid, but stern and to the point.

'Albert Maurice,' said the druggist, 'are we still one in purpose?'

'If you so will,' replied the young burgher; 'but beware that you bring nothing to divide our councils.

'Nay, rather, you beware that you stand not between the sword of justice and its victim,' rejoined the other; 'for, as I live, if you do, my love for you will become something bitterer than hate; and more than your ruin-the ruin of your cause-shall follow.'

The eye of the young citizen flashed fiercely. 'Mark me!' he said, grasping the arm of his companion, and bending his majestic head over him, while he fixed his full stern glance upon the sallow face of the other-' mark me! It is time that our mutual determination should be spoken; yours has already found voice-now hearken to mine. For the service you may do to the cause that I hold dear, I will give a certain way to your revenge. You see I understand you. But if you take one receive it, only as a reward for working thy step beyond that, and show me that you would rule our efforts for your purposes, I will crush you or die. Man, you have met with your master! and though you may have caused the misery of lordly houses, the star of my destiny is above your scope!'

As Albert Maurice spoke, the cheek of the druggist turned even paler than before; and he answered in a subdued voice, - 'Ha! indeed! We do, then, know more of each other than I thought. But this is all vain,' he added, after a momentary pause; 'if you know so much, you know, too, that I love you. But, Albert Maurice, I must-I will have my revenge.

'You shall have justice,' replied the young citizen, 'and I will not oppose you; though I think reason and humanity, and a right construction of the law, should save the unhappy men at whom you aim. The day after tomorrow, however, plead your own cause before the council in the town-hall. I will be absent; and if they judge for you, I will not own heart the specious sophistry of Ganay; interpose by word or deed.

The druggist paused, and thought for a 'Be it so,' he said, at length. 'They must condemn them : and now for you, ready assent followed his words, and many of Albert Maurice. Mark me! There are two the assembly rose to depart, 'to-morrow, by paths open before you. The one, which you eight in the morning, let us meet in the town- seem choosing for yourself, leads to a long which, after nicely balancing rights, and have I not your authority to provide for the weighing tenderly the thousand grains of dust that constitute all questions of government and policy, shall end in nothing for the state, The other, on and your own death and ruin. which I would guide you, conducts, by a few bold strides, to power, to empire, and to love! You see I know you, too! Choose for yourself, and let your actions speak the result. Farewell! I will be ever by your side, to prompt you to your own advantage, even to the last moment.'

Thus speaking, the druggist quitted the apartment, and followed the rest of the citizens; while Albert Maurice remained in the solitude of his own chamber, with his eyes fixed still upon the spot where Ganay had stood. 'To power-to empire-to love!' he repeated, in 'How dexterously you man a low tone. knows to mix the small portion of leaven, calculated to turn and change the whole heart of him to whom he speaks. To power -to empire-and to love!' and the young burgher cast himself in a seat, and covered his eyes with his hands, as if the very light of the lamps disturbed the intense thoughts that were working in the dark chamber of his bosom. 'No!' he cried, at length, clasping his hands together; 'No! no! no! My country! thou shalt be my first object; and if, in serving thee, without one effort for myself, aught of good befal me personally, I will freedom; but never shall the thought of my individual wishes mingle with my aspirations for the benefit of my native land.-Fiend! how thou hast tempted me!'

He then gave a moment or two to other ideas connected with his situation at this moment; and the first blossom of that full harvest of regrets, which every man, who sows the Cadmean seeds of civil strife, is destined to reap in bitterness of heart, rose up in his bosom, as he thought of the fate of the unhappy men, whom he felt forced to yield to the revenge of Ganay; or to resign every hope of delivering his country. It was the first sacrifice of better feeling he had yet been obliged to make ;-but the first is ever the augury of many more; - and Albert Maurice would fain have persuaded himself that it was not a sacrifice. He strove to prove to his own mind that the men deserved their fate. He called up instances of their severity -of their cruelty; and recapitulated to his asserting that the act they had committedhowever just had been their sentence on the druggist's son-was illegal, from the previous death of him from whom alone they derived their power. He reasoned, he argued in that the Lords of Ravestein and Cleves, with vain-his heart was unsatisfied; when a neigh- others to whom I have despatched messengers, bouring clock, striking the hour of five, made may soon arrive, and in sufficient force to him start from his seat, and gladly take advantage of its warning voice, to cast away thoughts that brought regret, in the busy activity of preparing the city to hold firmly the power it had assumed.

CHAPTER XXI.

FACE TO FACE WITH HER SUBJECTS.

WE shall pass over the forenoon of the fol-lowing day rapidly. The news of her father's death reached Mary of Burgundy early in the morning; and though she wept long and bitterly, her grief was now more calm and tranquil, than it had been while uncertainty remained mingled with sorrow. More agitating tidings, however, had reached the Lord of Imbercourt and the Chancellor Hugonet, at a still earlier hour; for, by daybreak, the first rumours of the disarming of the soldiery, and the seizure of the gates and walls of the city by the burgher guard, had been com-municated to them; and before they could take any measures in consequence, the painful fact that every post of defence in Ghent was in the hands of the citizens had been reported from all quarters. Respect for the grief of the Princess caused them to withhold from her, for some hours, the knowledge which they themselves possessed of the state of the city; and it was only when, by means of some other private agents, they received information that the principal burghers of the town had assembled in the town-house, and were voting a petition to the Princess, praying a restitution of all those rights and privileges of which they had been deprived by the Duke Charles, that they found it absolutely necessary to communicate to her, both what had occurred and what was likely to follow,

The news affected Mary of Burgundy less than they had expected; and, indeed, proved only a sufficient stimulus to rouse her from the grief into which she had fallen.

'Fear not, my Lord of Imbercourt,' she said, as she saw the apprehension that overshadowed his countenance; 'fear not, I will soon find means to quiet and satisfy the good people of Ghent. It was only while the will and ordinances of my father were opposed to my own inclinations, that I found any difficulty, or entertained any fear, in regard to the tranquillity of the state.

'I hope, madam, and I trust,' replied Imbercourt, that you may find it easy; but a stirred-up population is like one of those ravenous beasts, that seems to acquire a overawe these insolent burghers; so that you may be obliged to grant nothing but that which is just and right, and be able to check concession at the proper point. - Hark, lady!' he added, as a distant shout burst upon his ear, 'the unmanly brutes allow you not one day for sorrow: they are coming even now.

Mary's cheek turned a little pale; but she showed no other sign of apprehension; and merely replied-' Let them come, my lord; they shall find it difficult to conquer the love of Mary of Burgundy; for love is the only arms that I shall oppose to my subjects. Alas! that they should ever be mine!-I beseech you, my good lords, to have the hall of audience fittingly prepared to receive the people who seem approaching fast. Have such guards and attendants drawn up as may give us some show of state. Alice, my sweet friend, seek out the noble Duchess, and pray her to cast by her grief for a moment; for much do I need her presence and support, in what is about to occur.

The orders of the Princess were promptly obeyed. Margaret of York joined her in a few minutes. The hall of audience was prepared as speedily as possible; and everything was ready for the reception of the burghers before they reached the gates of the palace.

The deputation, consisting of about twenty persons, dressed in their municipal robes, proceeded from the town-house on foot, followed and surrounded by an immense multitude of the lower orders, shouting loudly-'Ghent and liberty! Ghent and liberty! Long live the noble Syndics.' They soon arrived at the building called the Cours du Prince; and some surprise, perhaps, was felt by the citizens, on finding themselves at once admitted to the palace, without any question, and ushered, through a line of armed guards, to the great hall of audience. The general impression among them was, that the counsellors of the Princess, possessing a greater armed force than the townsmen had been aware of, were determined to bring the matter to an immediate decision; and, perhaps, even to arrest them in the palace, for the events of the night before. This supposition was rather increased by the appearance of the hall of audience, which was also lined with armed attendants; and by the demeanour of Imbercourt, Hugonet, and other counsellors, who stood with somewhat severe and frowning countenances on each side of the chair of state, which now remained vacant, under the rich crimson canopy that had so often overhung the stern determined features of Charles the Bold.

As soon as they had entered the chamber greater appetite by feeding largely. I trust the deputation paused, uncertain to whom to that moment, however, when the dumb confronting of the court and the citizens was becoming even painful to both, the door by the side of the throne was thrown open by one of the huissiers or door-keepers, and Mary of Burgundy, leaning on the arm of Margaret of York, preceded by some of the officers of the palace, and followed by two or three female attendants, entered the apartment, and advanced towards the chair. She ascended the steps on which it was raised, but did not sit down; and, turning towards the deputation of the burghers, she bowed her head with a gentle inclination, while the novelty of her situation, the feeling that she was taking possession of her dead father's throne, and the difficulty of her circumstances, overcame her firmness for an instant, and she burst into tears.

She wiped the drops rapidly from her eyes, and made a sign to the Chancellor Hugonet, who immediately took a step forward, and said-addressing the deputation of citizens, who still stood at the further end of the room, - The high and mighty Princess, Mary, Duchess of Burgundy, Countess of Flanders and Hainault, is ready to receive any persons on behalf of her good town of Ghent.

There was a slight pause; and then Albert Maurice, as president of the provisional council, advanced towards the throne, and knelt on one knee upon the first step. Mary extended her fair hand to him, as he knelt, and with a flushed cheek and quivering lip, the young burgher bent his head over it, while something very like a tear glittered in his, too. In his left hand he held a roll of parchment; and, before he rose, he said-'Madam, of condolence, and petition, from your good and faithful subjects, the citizens of Ghent. Is it your good pleasure that I read it?'

Mary bowed her head; and Albert Maurice, which he held, and read, in gentle and respectful tones, the address which had that morning been agreed to in the town-hall. The terms in which it was couched were as mild and moderate as the young burgher, by his utmost eloquence, had been able to pro-The citizens, in the language of grief and respect, spoke of the high qualities of the late Duke of Burgundy; and touched, as lightly as possible, upon those acts of arbitrary power and barbarous harshness, which had noble and generous parts of his character have used.' might have obtained from his subjects. They address themselves. The counsellors neither in terms both severe and firm; and they petispoke nor changed their position; and, for a tioned the Princess immediately to take into few moments, there was a dead, unpleasant consideration the consequences which such silence, which no one chose to break. At aggressions had produced, and to remedy the wrong that had been done by her father.

While Albert Maurice read the petition, the deputation had gradually advanced, and formed a little semi-circle at a few yards' distance from the throne; and when the young citizen had concluded, the Princess immediately replied, addressing herself to

'I did think, my good friends,' she said, in a tone rather sad than reproachful, 'that the day on which I first heard the sad news of my poor father's death might have been passed in privacy, sanctified to mourning and to sorrow. I know, however, that communities are little capable of feeling for the griefs and affections of individuals, especially when those individuals are their princes; and, therefore, laying by my sorrow, I come willingly to hear your wants and wishes, and to assure you all, of my firm resolve to do everything I can, to satisfy and to make you happy. In regard to the rights and privileges of the city of Ghent, far be it from me, now or ever, to inquire why they were restrained or abridged by your late sovereign lord, my father; or to renew old griefs and dissensions, by investigating who was right or wrong in the times past. Me, men of Ghent, ye have never yet offended: ye are my fellow-countrymen, therefore I feel for you; ye are my subjects, therefore I love you. At once, then, whether as a boon, or as a right-whether as your own due, or as a testimony of the affection of Mary of Burgundy-take, hold, and use wisely, all those privileges and immunities whatever, which ye can prove that ye have possessed at any time within fifty years of the present day. Farther back let us not inquire, for it would lead us I come to lay at your feet a humble address to times when Gheat and Flanders, under the usurped domination of a man who was raised from the dregs of the people, by the people's discontent, endured a grosser and more bloody tyranny than ever they suffered rising from his knee, unrolled the parchment from the most savage and cruel of their native princes.

'We thankfully accept your grace's bounty,' replied Albert Maurice; 'and without derogating from our own inherent rights, we willingly receive your free and generous confirmation of them, as a grace and benefit conferred; and so humbly take our leave.'

'You will confer, my friends,' said Mary, 'with my Chancellor here present, in regard to all the particulars which you may claim, and will have them clearly established and dedeprived him of that love, which the more fined, to the full extent of the words that I

The deputation were then permitted to kiss continued, however, to notice his attacks upon the hand of the Princess, and withdrew; and the liberties of the good towns of Flanders, Mary, after giving one hasty glance round the hall of audience, refired, once more to in- lar indignation, or to divert it from the point dulge her grief in her own apartments.

terrupted from time to time by an occasional which it was thought indispensable to comcity, however, the day went by with all those signs which show an anxious and excited population. Continual crowds collected in various parts of the town, now conversing among themselves, now listening to some popular declaimer. The busy and important were seen hurrying to and from in every direction. The song, the fiddle, or the cornemuse, were exchanged for pitiable verses on the pitiable battle of Nancy; and while one part of it. the city was overflowing with people, and rang with the sound of many tongues, another silence and solitude. At length; towards evendisplayed itself. Whispers and rumours, originating no one knew where, were spread rapidly amongst the crowd, tending strongly to excite them to outrage. Some said that soldiers; some that the nobles were arming and most generally credited reports were directed against the eschevins, or police magistrates of the city, whose very duty of investigation and punishment rendered them at all times obnoxious to the lower classes, but who were now hated in a tenfold degree, from the abrogation of the popular form of election in their last appointment. In several districts petty tumults actually took place: noble or a lawyer was insulted as soon as he appeared; and the burgher guard, which was more than once called out, with a very natuselected, took merely such means of repres- of pacifying the people? sion as dispersed the crowds in one spot, only to collect in larger numbers in another.

In the mean while, Maillotin du Bac, as Prévôt, and the druggist Ganay, as one of the notables of the town, mingled with the crowds, and harangued them with the apparent purpose of persuading them to return peaceably to their houses. The first, indeed, was anything but popular in the city; and some supposed that he was exposing himself to outrage by the active part he took; but it vate the people, and how speedily the multi- six months, against any force they can bring. tude forgot his former conduct. It is true to which it was tending. They used every With her, and with the Duchess of York, sort of common-place argument to induce the hours passed in lonely mourning, only in- the people to return to their own dwellings. They told them that it would be much better, call to transact some of the necessary business much safer, much more prudent, to disperse, of the state; or by the tidings of some event and to let things take their course, though they acknowledged, at the same time, that municate. In the streets and lanes of the the eschevins, in discharge of their illegal office, had acted cruelly and basely. Nevertheless, they said, that those instruments of tyranny would doubtless be brought to justice, if they were not by any means smuggled out of the city. In short, they did what may always be done, excited the people in a far greater degree, while they affected to tranquillise them; and pointed their fury to the very object from which they pretended to turn

The troops which remained in the town, though totally insufficient to overawe the showed streets totally deserted, the abode of citizens, or to re-possess themselves of the walls and gates, were numerous enough to ing, a strong disposition to riot and tumult hold out, for any length of time, the palace of Cours du Prince, as it was called, which, according to the custom of the day, was strongly fortified; and which was, luckily, fully provisioned. The attention, therefore, the council were bringing in large bodies of of the ministers of the orphan Princess was solely directed to adding temporary defences their attendants, and intended to repossess to her dwelling, and to repairing any slight themselves of the gates. But the strongest defect which time or oversight had produced, without attempting the vain task of putting down the turbulent spirit which was manifesting itself in the city. No hostility, indeed, was evinced by the populace towards the Princess or her attendants; and servants were suffered to go to and from the palace without the slightest molestation. But still the tidings of tumultuous movements, in various parts of the town, poured in through the evening; whoever bore the appearance of either a and the distant shouts and cries caught the ear of Mary herself, and more than once made her inquire the cause. Towards nightfall, Imbercourt was summoned to her presence; ral leaning to the people from which it was and she asked eagerly if there were no means

None, madam, replied the minister; without, indeed, you could bribe some of their demagogues; and that would, of course, be merely hiring them to create tumults hereafter, whenever they wanted a fresh supply. I am afraid they must be suffered to have their way for a time. In the end the people will see their own folly, and the base selfishness of those that mislead them, and will return to quiet and tranquillity of their own accord. In the meanwhile, thank God, the was wonderful to see how readily he assumed palace is secure; so be under no apprehenthe tone and deportment necessary to capti- sions, madam, for we could hold it out for

'Oh, I fear not for myself, my lord,' rethat neither he nor Ganay in their speeches plied Mary; 'I fear for my subjects and my said one word to appease the current of popu- friends. I beseech you, my lord, leave not the palace to-night: they might murder you in your way to your own hotel.

'I do not believe, madam, that they have 'I have never done them wrong, and have remain here, at least till the town is somewhat more calm; and I certainly shall not quit the palace this night.

So saying, he withdrew; and Mary ap- people loved each otherproached the lattice of the room in which she 'Hush, hush! Alice, I entreat—I comhad been sitting, and which commanded a mand,' interrupted the Princess. 'It must somewhat extensive view over the city; though the objects that were to be seen were more the roofs of buildings and the spires of churches than the busy multitudes which she would fain have watched, herself unseen. Every caught of some of the manifold canals and squares of Ghent; and Mary threw open the window to see if, ere the light faded away entirely, she could gain a view of any of the crowds whose shouts she heard. But her effort was in vain; and, turning away from the chilling blast of the January wind, she closed the window, and was returning to her seat, when she found that Alice of Imbercourt

'I wish, dearest lady,' said her fair follower, 'that you would take the counsel of a simple girl, which, I have a great belief, would be better than that of all these grave signors.'

'Well, my Alice,' replied the Princess, with a faint smile, 'what would you have me do?'

'Ay, indeed, as boldly as you will,' said most nobly. Mary, whose heart wanted some bosom into first, dear friend, send away those two girls, who sit moping by the fire, sharing my distress without feeling my grief. Bid the page go light the lamps in the other chamber; and man has too high a mind, and too noble a tell them to take thither their embroidery frames, and work diligently, while we stay here in the grey twilight, as dim and melancholy as my thoughts.

Her commands were speedily obeyed. 'And now, Alice,' she said, as the other returned,

'what would you have me do?'

'I would have you despatch a messenger this very night,' replied the young lady, boldly, 'to the only person to whose arm and to whose heart you could confide to defend and guard you in the present strait-I mean to the Arch-

advise me to such a step. Fie! fie! mention madness of the people.

it not !

'I knew that you would start away, my dearest mistress,' replied her fair counsellor; 'but you must hear me still. What can you any ill-will towards me,' replied Imbercourt; do better? What can you do so well? The circumstances in which you are placed-the often stood between them and the anger of difficulties which surround you-do they not their Prince. But my duty commands me to justify such an act? do they not render it wise and right, instead of indelicate and bold? The Archduke Maximilian was once plighted to you by your own father; and if ever two > not, it cannot be. If such be all your advice, speak no more; what I wanted was counsel how to tranquillise these unquiet people of Ghent.

'I had something to say on that score, too,' now and then, however, a glance was to be replied Alice of Imbercourt; 'but, perchance, my advice will not be more palatable to you, in regard to that matter, than in regard to the other,

'Nay, nay; be not offended, Alice,' replied Mary; 'none can judge of that on which you were speaking, but myself; but of this business of Ghent, perhaps any one can judge better.

'Well, then, madam, I will say my say,' had followed her to the deep arch in which replied Alice; 'and you can follow my counsel or not, as you think best. You saw the young burgher, with the furred robe and the gold chain, who read you the address this morning-you must remember him-as handsome a youth as ever lady's eye rested on.'

'I scarcely saw him,' replied the Princess; 'nor should have noticed him at all, but that I think it was the same who, some three or May I speak boldly, lady?' demanded four months since, was accused before the council of high treason, and acquitted himself

'The same, exactly the same,' replied which to pour its anxieties and sorrow. - 'But Alice; 'his name is Albert Maurice, as I hear; and he bears the noblest reputation of any young citizen of them all. I have heard even my own father declare, that you young spirit, for his class and station.

'Well, what of him?' demanded the Princess; 'I fear me that his noble spirit will work us little good; for, from all I saw today, he seems to lead the disaffected of the city

'You marked him not as I did, madam,' replied Alice; 'never mind what I saw, or what I fancied that I saw. He does lead all parties in the city, I hear; and I am fain to think, that had it not been for him, that petition and address, as they call it, would have had a ruder tone. Lady, that young man is 'Hush, hush! Not for a universe!' cried well disposed towards you and yours; and I 'Good God! what would he deem believe that he might be easily worked upon me? No, Alice, no! you would surely never to use his great influence to cure the present

'Indeed, I believe he is well disposed,'

replied Mary; 'for, I remember, by your lady,' she added, seeing Mary about to make father's council, I had him called back after some farther opposition, 'I will take it all upon the trial, and besought him, in private, to do myself. I will write the note and send the his best to maintain peace and order in the

My father's council was wise, madam,' replied Alice, with a quiet smile; 'and his daughter's is just of the same piece. What I would have you do now, is what my father led you to do then. Send for this Albert Maurice, and beseech him, fairly and gently, to do his best to quiet the populace, and to restore tranquillity. Appeal to his generosity—to his gratitude; show him how frankly you granted the petition of the citizens this morning; and, take my word, you will make a convert and a powerful friend.

'With all my heart,' replied Mary, at once; 'but there is no time to be lost. Hie thee down to thy father, dear Alice; tell him what I have resolved to do, and bid him send a messenger for the young citizen directly.

'Nay, nay, dear lady,' answered Alice, smiling again, 'that way will never do. In the first place, I hear my father is not, just now, the best beloved in the city, for suffering a young man to be executed, who had committed murder, and was condemned by the eschevins; and, besides that, I learned from one of my women but now, that my father had sent, in his own name, to this Albert Maurice and another of the citizens, named Ganay, and that they refused to come.

'Then, most probably, they would refuse me, too,' replied the Princess; 'and though Mary of Burgundy will do all that she can to make her people happy, she must not stoop to beg their presence, and be refused.'

'No fear, no fear, madam,' replied Alice; 'but leave the matter to me, and I will answer for it, that, ere half an hour be over, the young citizen shall be standing here before you.

'What do you propose to do, then?' demanded the Princess.

'Merely to write a billet, desiring Master Albert Maurice, in the name of Mary, Duchess of Burgundy, to render himself to the palace, with all speed, in order to speak with his sovereign.'

'Nay, but it may seem strange,' said the Princess; 'I hardly dare do so without speaking with your father.'

you suspect. I have already heard the con- gates, to refuse admission to any arty of stable of the reiters and one of your Grace's armed men; and he issued orders for the council regretting that they did not seize upon fabrication of arms as speedily as possible, in the deputation this morning, as a pledge for order that the citizens might be in a state of the submission of the people. No, no; he preparation, in case the privileges and liberty must come in disguise, and must go in dis- they had regained should be menaced from guise. I will send the page with the billet; without. he is shrewd and active, and shall bring him in by the postern, on the canal. Nay, nay, remained after his return home; and busy page, and bid the sentry give him admission on his return; and if aught is heard of it, it will but pass for the trick of a mad-headed girl; and I have more to lose than you, too,' she continued, laughing; 'for I have a lover who could be as jealous as a spaniel dog, if I chose to let him.

The Princess still hesitated, and probably might have refused her consent; but some nearer and louder shouts met her ear, giving evidence that the crowds were increasing as the night came on, and determined her to accede. Alice's proposal was agreed to accordingly; and, as every moment was apparently adding to the tumult in the city, she proceeded to put it in execution immediately.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE SECRET MEETING.

THE torrent of business in which Albert Maurice found himself involved, occupied his time in such a manner as hardly to permit of his giving much attention to the tumultuous assemblages which took place during the day, in various parts of the city. Popular leaders, indeed, are apt to attach too little importance to those commotions which, being frequently raised by themselves with ease and rapidity. they fancy they can allay with the same facility and power. Towards two o'clock the young citizen had addressed the people in the marketplace, and had easily induced them to disperse, by informing them that the Princess had most generously granted them, of her own accord, all that they could desire. He had then-in the belief that all the other crowds would melt away, in the same manner, before night-retired to his own dwelling; and in the most remote and noiseless apartment which it contained, had proceeded to make, with rapidity and decision, all those arrangements on which depended the defence of the city against external enemies, and the predominance of the popular party within its walls. He wrote instantly to all the municipal councils of the various towns in Flanders; he took 'If you do, lady,' replied Alice, 'all our measures for organising a considerable nascheme fails, or worse may come of it than tional force; he sent express orders to all the hours they were. At length, feeling himself, could not but feel that the step proposed to notwithstanding his great corporeal powers, him was replete with peril. Was it probable, somewhat wearied with the immense exertions he asked himself, that the Princess should the city burst upon his ear; and, after listen-popular party—the president of the provisional ing for a few moments to the combination of council—into their hands, as a tie upon the discordant sounds which rose up from the people? many streets and squares, he saw at once that demanded to speak with him.

Thus passed the three hours of light that

the young citizen.

'I bear you a billet from a lady,' replied the youth; and you must read it directly.

'A billet from a lady!' cried Albert Maurice, with a sneer, curling his handsome lip; hence. I will read it to-morrow.'

'Nay; but you must read it this moment,' 'ay, and that in private, too,' he added. 'So robe which he had worn through the day,- thing in the deportment of the boy so unlike happen what will in the course before us. that of the common Love's messengers of those Better follow at a short distance behind, in which a light was still burning.

The moment he had entered, the apparel you will find me on the narrow path beneath of the page, and a small St. Andrew's cross, the walls.' embroidered on his left breast, at once showed As he spoke thus, he darted away, and to the postern on the river.'

since forced itself upon his notice, and he women, whose class and appearance did not

which he had made, he proceeded into the send to him at that hour? And was not the garden attached to his dwelling, which formed note he held in his hand much more likely to a little terrace on the banks of the Lys. As be part of a scheme framed by the Prévôt or he stood there, turning his aching brow to some of the inferior agents of the govern-the cool wind, the full roar of the tumult in ment, in order to get the chief leader of the

Yet, as he gazed upon the billet, it was evisome great change had taken place in the dently a woman's writing; and as he re-read popular mind since he had left the great the contents, there was something in it all market-place: and, turning quickly back, he which put prudence and caution to flight at prepared to go forth and use all the power he once. Was not the very name of Mary of knew that he possessed to restore tranquillity. Burgundy enough? To be requested by her At his own door, however, he was met by a to visit her dwelling in secrecy and disguise! boy, who instantly pronounced his name, and -to seek her, to speak with her in private !to bask in the light of those beautiful eyes !-'Who, and what are you, boy?' demanded to hear that soft and thrilling voice !-the very hope was worth all the perils that ever knight or paladin encountered, and his re-perusal of the billet determined him at once to go. Where to find some speedy means of disguising his person was his next thought; but 'go, go, my boy, this is no time for idle then, immediately remembering the grey gallantries. Give me the note, and get thee monk's gown in which he had already travelled so far, and which, by some accident, had been left behind by his former guide, he the other replied, without giving him the note: instantly sought it out, -stripped the furred come, good sir, go back into your house, and and buckling on a sword and poniard under take it with reverence and care, for it deserves the frock, strode on after the page with that increased feeling of security which we all ex-'Thou art bold enough,' replied Albert perience when we know that we have the Maurice; but at the same time there was somemeans about us of selling our lives dearly, days, that he yielded to his desire; and, turn- good father, said the boy, as they proceeded ing back into the house, strode quickly to the into the street; 'you know your way towards chamber in which he had been writing, and the back of the Cours du Prince. If we go separate we shall the better escape notice, and

him that he was a servant of the house of Albert Maurice followed with the hurried step Burgundy. Instantly closing the door, Albert of excitement and expectation. It was now Maurice took the note with every sign of completely dark; and passing onward along reverence and respect, and read it over atten- the quay of the canals, and through one or evely by the light of the lamp. As he did so, two of the many large squares of Ghent, he however, his cheek flushed, and then turned soon saw enough of popular feeling to make pale and flushed again, and he demanded him hurry his steps, anxious to resume a garb eagerly,-'Who gave you this note, Sir in which he might take measures for repressing the turbulent spirit that was every mo-Page?

The Lady Alice of Imbercourt, replied ment gaining ground. At the corner of each of the larger streets immense bonfires, blazing the boy; 'and she bade me lead you speedily of the larger streets immense bonfires, blazing and crackling in the frosty air, at once Albert Maurice paused, and mused; and lighted, and warmed, and excited, the multhough no heart that ever beat in a human titudes that assembled round them, But bosom knew less of fear than his, yet the ordi- this was not all; wine and ale too, that nary calculation of danger which every one genuine Flemish beverage, were circulating makes when engaged in enterprises of important rapidly amongst the crowds of men and at all warrant the supposition that their own sport, each ornamented in some way with the nary occasion, such copious supplies of dear walls in the manner of trophies. and intoxicating liquors. All this excited a There is something strangely solemn suspicion in the mind of Albert Maurice, that entering the chamber of one lately dead. the news of the loss of a great battle, and the death of their bold and chivalrous sovereign, was indecent in itself, and must be bitter indeed to the child of the dead Prince. Such sights, of course, increased his speed; and hastening on as fast as possible, he soon found found amongst the living. himself upon the narrow ledge of land between the fortified wall of the palace and the river. But he was alone—the page was no-where to be seen, and Albert Maurice began to suspect he had been deceived; but, a moment after, the appearance of the boy, hurrying up as fast as his less powerful limbs permitted, soon showed him that his own anxious haste had outstripped even the page's youthful activity.

Although a sentry paraded the wall above, with his slow match lighted, no challenge was given; and three sharp taps upon the postern door soon caused it to fly open and admit them within the walls of the building. An inferior officer of the guard stood by, and held a lantern to the face of the page as he entered. The boy endured his scrutiny quietly; but, to the surprise of the young citizen, he found that the appearance of the page was received as a passport for himself. The officer withdrew the lantern without farther comment, as soon as he had satisfied himself of the boy's identity, and suffered Albert Maurice and his conductor to enter the palace. Up long and manifold staircases, through innumerable doors and interminable passages, the page led the leader of the Gandois, and only stopped at length, when both were out told to come in, and remained within for some minutes, while the young burgher continued in the dark passage—his heart beating with that thrill of expectation, as he thought of his near meeting with Mary of Burgundy, which would seem to partake of the nature of fear, were it not almost always mingled in some way with feelings not only of hope, but

ing the young burgher to another door, threw it open, and admitted him into an apartment a thousand wild and whirling images rushed fitted up with all the ostentatious splendour across his brain-of triumph, and success, and for which Charles of Burgundy had been love. But how was it all to be obtained? famous in the decoration of his palaces. It -by overthrowing her power to raise himseemed to have been a room peculiarly allotted self into her rank, -by overturning the instito that Prince's leisure moments; for all tutions of his country,-by risking the around hung various implements of sylvan effusion of oceans of blood, and by inducing means could procure, even on an extraordi- arms of Burgundy, and piled up against the

There is something strangely solemn in some unseen agency was at work, to rouse the seems more empty-more vacant and cold people to a far higher pitch than he wished than when its master, though absent, is livor expected; and, at the same time, he felt ing. It appeals to our own feelings and conthat such scenes of tumultuous rejoicing on nects itself—by the thin gossamer threads of selfishness which the human heart draws between our own fate and every external event that befalls our fellow-men-with an afterperiod, when our chamber shall be left thus cold and lonely, and our place be no longer

> All spoke of the late Duke Charles, and of the bold rude sports of which he had been fond. Even the sconce that held a few lighted tapers, was fashioned in the shape of a boar's head; and as the young citizen entered the chamber he felt that feeling of pity for, and sympathy with, the deceased Prince which nothing could have inspired but his deaththat common fate which breaks down all that holds man from man, and first makes us feel our near kindred to each other.

There was no one in the chamber; and the page, after telling Albert Maurice that the lady would be with him in a moment, retired and left him to think both of the living and the dead. His thoughts of the latter, however, soon ceased; for, in this active life, the solemn impressions are naturally the most transitory; and the expectation of meeting Mary of Burgundy soon absorbed the whole. He had no time to analyse his feelings, or to examine with microscopic accuracy the workings of his own heart. Since the day he had first seen her in the market-place her image had become connected with almost every thought that had passed through his mind. The name of the Princess, and her conduct in all the events of the day, of course formed a constant part in the conversation of the people; breath, at a small, deep doorway, where he and whenever she was mentioned, the fair knocked before he entered, making a sign to form and the mild liquid eye rose to the sight Albert Maurice to pause. The boy was then of the young burgher; and the sweet melodious tones of her voice seemed to warble in his ear. He had refused to suffer his own mind to inquire what was going on in his bosom; but the words of Ganay had perhaps, in some degree, opened his eyes to his own feelings, and the sensations which he experienced while waiting her coming in that chamber tended still more to undeceive him. 'What, what was he doing?' he asked him-After a time the boy returned; and, lead-self: encouraging a passion for an object beg the young burgher to another door, threw yond his reach. But even while he so thought months of anarchy?-Still this was the only means by which he could ever hope to win fair attendant, 'my information came from the hand of Mary of Burgundy; and he asked you; I hope it was correct. himself, would such means win her love?hitherto struggled with patriotism in his bosom, would it obtain the gratification of passion, still, destined to use the two others as its mere slaves?

Such feelings as I have said rushed rapidly through his brain, while expectation mingled with the rest, and made his heart beat till it ago, by the report of one of my women, that almost caused him to gasp for breath. These a direct refusal had been returned. sensations were becoming almost intolerable, Imbercourt, entered the apartment, and the door was closed. The Princess was still pale with grief; but there was a fitful colour came and went in her cheek that was far lovelier than the most rosy health. Her eyes, too, bore the traces of tears; but their heaviness had something touching in it, which, per-haps, went more directly to the heart than their brighter light.

With a flushed cheek and agitated frame the young burgher advanced a step, and made a profound indication of the head as Mary entered, not well knowing whether, when re-ceived in so private a manner, to kneel or not; but Mary, after pausing a moment, with a doubtful glance, as her eye fell upon the monk's frock with which he was covered, held out her hand for him to kiss as her subject, a custom then common to all ladies of sovereign station, and the young citizen at once bent one knee, and touched that fair hand, with a lip that quivered like that of a frightened child. He then rose, and, stepping back, waited for Mary to express her commands, though his eye from time to time was raised for a single instant to her face, as if he thought to impress those fair features still more deeply on the tablet of his heart.

'I thank you, sir, for coming so speedily,' said the Princess; 'for, in truth, I have much need of your council and assistance.

doubt of my instant obedience to your comshe paused.

'The only thing which could have led me to do so,' replied the Princess, 'was your refusal to come at the bidding of my faithful friends, the Lords of Imbercourt and Hugonet.

'There is some great mistake, madam,' replied the young citizen, in surprise; 'the noblemen to whom your grace refers have never signified any wish to see me. Had they done so, I should have come at their request with the same confidence that I have obeyed your commands,'

'Alice,' said the Princess, turning to the

'All I can say, fair sir,' said Alice of Imeven were he to give way to the towering ambercourt, advancing a step, and applying to bition which was the only passion that had the young burgher the term that was generally used in that day, from noble to noble, - 'all I can say, fair sir, is, that I heard my that love which was now rising up, a stronger father, the Lord of Imbercourt, despatch a messenger this day, at about four of the clock, to entreat Master Albert Maurice and Master Walter Ganay to visit him at the palace immediately. And I heard, scarcely an hour

'Not by me, lady, certainly not by me, when the door opened, and Mary of Bur-replied Albert Maurice. 'Since the hour of gundy, followed a step behind by Alice of two, this day, I have been in my own cabinet busily engaged in writing, and know but little of what has passed in the city. But certainly no messenger has ever reached me to-day from the palace, except the page who brought me the command, which I am here to obey. But you say another name was coupled with mine. Perhaps that person may have returned the uncourteous refusal of which you speak.

'I am very sorry for it, then,' answered Mary of Burgundy; 'for the matter on which I desired to see you, sir, would be much better transacted with men and statesmen than with a weak woman like myself."

'Your pardon, madam!' replied Albert 'If what you would say refers to Maurice. the city of Ghent and its present state, much more may be done by your own commands, expressed personally to myself, than by an oration of the wisest minister that ever yet was born. Statesmen, madam, are often too cold, too prudent, too cautious, to deal with the frank multitude, whose actions are all passion, and whose motives are all impulse. But, oh! madam, there is a natural, generous, gentle feeling about all your demeanour, from your lightest word to your most important deed, which is well calculated to make our hearts serve you, as well as our heads or our hands.'

The young burgher spoke with a fervour 'I trust, madam, you could not entertain a and an enthusiasm that called the blood up for a moment into Mary's cheek. But as the mands,' replied Albert Maurice, finding that chivalrous courtesy of the day often prompted expressions of much more romantic admiration, without the slightest further meaning than mere ordinary civility, Mary of Burgundy saw nothing in the conduct of the young citizen beyond dutiful and loyal affection. The possibility of her having raised a deeper or more tender feeling in the bosom of her subject never once crossed her thoughts. It was to her as a thing impossible; and, though she certainly felt gratified by the fervent tone of loyalty in which Albert Maurice expressed himself, she dreamed not for a moment that that loyalty could ever become a more indivi- madam, what they have done, or what they dual feeling.

the opinion you have expressed, and to keep However, I will this instant go forth, and, as the love of my good people of Ghent, as well I live, if they have committed the crimes of as that of all my subjects. But, indeed, the which I fear they are guilty, from some of the conduct that they are now pursuing evinces cries I have just heard, the perpetrators shall but small regard either for my feelings or my meet the punishment they deserve. interest, nor much gratitude for the first willing concession that I have made in their but Mary desired him to pause. 'Stay, stay, favour. You say, sir, you know little that has sir, a moment, she said: 'Alice, bid the page passed in the city since an early hour, listen, see that the way is clear.' then, to the tidings that have reached me.'

communication which it rendered necessary, began to pour through the open window, and from the continual bursts of high and waxing stronger each moment: and Mary, generous feelings, upon both parts, to which whose face was half turned towards it, started brought all the sentiments of the young citizen God, they have set fire to the city! within the circle of the one deep, overpowering passion which had been long growing up in and, as with his right hand he threw further his bosom. whether he loved Mary of Burgundy, before moment on that of Mary of Burgundy, which held was turned towards the river, rather were seen flashing together upon the river, than to the square before the palace; and the amidst the innumerable black spots occasioned audible in the apartments from which Mary human figures might be descried, gazing with had just come, had hitherto been less dis- up-turned faces at the flame. The wooden tinctly heard where she now stood. But, in bridge, too, with the crossing and interlacing a moment after, the multitudes which had of its manifold piles and beams, appeared at assembled in other places seemed directing a little distance beyond-a piece of dark fine their course over a bridge, which lay a little tracery upon the glittering mass of the stream; higher up the stream; and the sounds came and there, too, an immense multitude were to with redoubled force. songs of every kind were borne along with which was consuming some of the finest the wind, to the chamber in which the Prin- buildings in the city. cess was standing; and, pointing to the casement, she bade the young citizen open it, and at one glance. listen himself to what was passing without.

are about to do, but certainly some sort of 'I trust, sir,' she replied, 'ever to merit insanity seems to have seized upon the people.

He turned towards the door as he spoke.

The young lady opened the door, and whis-Mary then recapitulated all that she had pered a few words to the boy, who waited in heard concerning the tumults in different the passage beyond, and who instantly proparts of the city; and a conversation of con- ceeded to ascertain that no change had taken siderable length ensued, which,-from all the place to obstruct the burgher's egress from important and interesting circumstances dis- the palace. Scarcely was he gone on this cussed, from the free and unceremonious errand, however, when a pale reddish glare the great events they spoke of gave rise, - forward, exclaiming, 'Look! look! Good

Albert Maurice sprang to the casement also. If he came there doubting open the lattice, his left rested for a single whether he loved wary of burgandy, belief hishland of that of that of that, of burgandy, which he left her presence his only doubt was, she had accidentally placed upon the sill of the whether there was anything else on earth window. It was but for an instant, yet a worth living for but the love he felt towards thrill passed through his whole frame that her.

But he had no Such feelings had their natural effect both time to indulge such thoughts. A bright on his appearance and demeanour. He still pyramid of flame was at that very moment maintained that tone of deep respect due from rising up through the clear night air, making a subject to his sovereign; but there was a a strange and fearful contrast with the pure brilliant energy in all he said, a spirit of sweet beams of the early moon. Redder and bothlant energy in all he said, a spint of sweet beams of the early moon. Redet and gentle, chivalrous loyalty in all his professions, redder the baleful glare of the fire rose up, as inspired by the great excitement under which if striving to outshine the moonlight, and he spoke, that raised the wonder and admiration of Mary herself, though still no one black masses of the buildings—wall, and roof, dream of bolder aspirations ever crossed her and tower, and spire standing out in clear imagination.

The chamber in which this conference was blaze. Thence gleaming on, the two lights shouts which had made themselves loudly by the boats, in many of which a number of Shouts, cries, and be observed, looking on calmly at the fire

All this was gathered by the young citizen

'They have set fire to the prison and the Albert Maurice did so, and, in listening, his hall of justice, he cried, divining in an instant, cheek became alternately pale and red, his both from the direction of the flames, and the brow knitted, and his eye flashed; and, turn-cries he had before heard, the crime that had ing to the Princess, he replied, 'I know not, been committed, 'This must be put a stop have done my duty.

Albert Maurice followed him with a rapid stopped for an instant. step through the same passages by which he step through the same passages by which he 'Are you ready to obey my commands, had been conducted to his interview with the Gibelin?' he demanded. Princess: Just as they reached the ground floor of the castle, however, there was the other; 'the rogues have set fire to the hall of sound of a coming step. The boy darted justice.' across the corridor in a moment, and Albert Maurice had but time to draw the cowl of his me thither, and, as you go, collect as many as monk's gown over his head, when ne was encountered by the Lord of Imbercourt, advancing with a hasty step towards the apartments of the Princess.

The young citizen, with all his feelings excited by what had just passed, was both fearless and careless of any mortal thing, and, making slight way for the nobleman to pass, was striding rapidly on after the page; but Imbercourt caught him by the arm, exclaiming, 'Who are you, sir? and what do you here?'

'I do the errand on which I am sent,' man. Unhand me, sir; for I am not to be stayed.

'Not till I see your face,' replied Imbercourt; 'your voice I should know. But that form, I doubt me, is no monk's.2

As he spoke, he raised his hand towards the cowl which covered the head of the young citizen. But Albert Maurice shook off his grasp in a moment, saying, 'Man, you are unwise! stay me further at your peril.'
'Ho! a guard without there!' shouted the Lord of Imbercourt, till the whole passages rang, and cast himself immediately in the path of the burgher. But Albert Maurice seized him in his powerful grasp, and with one effort sent him reeling to the further part of the corridor, where he fell almost stunned upon the floor.

Without a moment's pause, the young citizen darted through the door by which the page had disappeared, traced without difficulty the passages which led to the postern, passed unquestioned by the sentry who was conversing with the boy, and, in a moment after, was standing upon the terrace without the palace walls.

Casting off the monk's gown, he rolled it light. hastily up and threw it into the water; and then striding along the narrow quay between the Cours du Prince and the river, he directed his way at once towards the bridge. It was cognising him as he came upon it, pronounced act, is not so generally recorded. passed on, forcing his way through the crowd, mitted; and many of those who had taken a but marking the various countenances, as he leading part therein, were still making a parade to! Madam, farewell. When you shall hear went, by the light which the flames of the to-morrow of the events of this night, you burning buildings cast upon them. There shall either hear that I am dead, or that I were many he recognised, but he spoke to none for some moments, till he came to a stout The page had by this time returned; and honest-looking clothworker, near whom he

'To the death, Master Albert,' replied the

'I see,' answered Albert Maurice; 'follow you can who will obey without question.

He then strode on, stopping from time to time at the various crowds, wherever he recognised a person on whom he could depend. With each of these, a momentary conversation took place, of the same nature as that which he had held with the man he called Gibelin. To some, however, his address was much more brief. With some, merely, 'Follow me, Kold! follow me, Gastner!'

His commands were instantly obeyed; those he charged to collect more were successful in doing so; and as he made his way forward, a replied the young citizen, and interrupt no body of two or three hundred men, gathered in this manner from the different crowds, continued pushing their way after him in an irregular manner, up the great street, in which the old prison and hall of justice were situated. Those buildings had been built so as to retire a little from the general façade of the street; and, being placed exactly opposite to each other, left a sort of square between them. The edifices on both sides were now on fire; but, notwithstanding the intense heat, the place or square was filled to overflowing with people, whose appearance and occupation were altogether those of devils in human form. The blaze of the burning buildings cast upon their swarthy and excited countenances-disfigured as they already were by drink and passion-a glare that seemed perfectly infernal. Loud shouts of exultation, or rather a yell of triumphant hatred, rent the air; and round about the square, suspended by the neck to the long stone water spouts which then distinguished the city of Ghent, were to be seen a number of human figures, quivering and convulsed in the agonies of death, while the demon shouts of the populace hailed the contortions of their victims with horrible de-

Such, it is well known, was the death of the unhappy eschevins, whom Charles of Burgundy had appointed for the city of Ghent; but the vengeance which was immediately still covered with people; and some one, re- taken on some of the perpetrators of that cruel his name, which was instantly spoken by a Maurice found the multitude in the first exulhundred other voices. Still Albert Maurice tation of the barbarous feat they had comhesitated not a moment, but striding up to a to be conclusive in regard to their guilt and wretch who held the end of one of the ropes punishment. A confessor was summoned; used as the means of inflicting death upon the eschevins, he seized him at once by the collar middle of the square.

A momentary movement was made by the people to resent this interference, and to rescue their comrade; but he was instantly passed from the hands of Albert Maurice to the trustworthy followers whom he had called together, with the words, 'To the town-house!' next moment the young citizen, without appearing even to see or notice the threatening aspect of the people, again strode through hausted with all he had gone through during the midst of them, and made another prisoner of a better class, thundering no measured upon his bed, and slept. terms of reproach upon him as he cast him back into the hands of those that followed. The multitude now perceived that amongst themselves, in every part of the square, there were persons of their own rank and appearance, acting with the young burgher, whose name, -never mentioned by any of the citizens without respect and applause—also began to circulate rapidly amongst them. Even those most bent upon evil, not knowing who was prepared to support and who to oppose them, lost confidence in themselves; fear, the most contagious of all diseases, seized them; and, one by one, they made their way from the scene of their criminal excesses. Those on the outside of the mass felt those within pressing to escape, and, catching the alarm, began to run also; so that in a few minutes, Albert Maurice, and the men who had followed him, alone remained in the square, together with three prisoners, while a fourth had been hurried away.

To cut down the bodies of the unhappy men who had become the victims of popular fury was the first effort of the burgher and his companions; but as all aid in their case was found to be in vain, the attention of Albert Maurice was next turned to prevent the conflagration from spreading further than the public building in which it had originated. As they were very much isolated in their situation, this purpose was easily effected; amongst the withered leaves, or collected in and, as soon as it was accomplished, the thick sweeps upon the dingle side,—it retained young citizen proceeded with hasty steps to- no form but that given to it by the wind; so wards the town-house, where he found a num-that the deep footprint of the stag or boar was ber of the municipal officers in somewhat effaced almost as soon as made, and the only lengthy debate concerning the measures to be mark by which the eye of the most experienced pursued for tranquillising the city. The su-perior mind of Albert Maurice instantly quarry, would have been by the hoar frost brought all wordy discussions to an end; brushed off the boughs of the thickets in the and while armed parties of the burgher guard animal's course through the wood. were despatched with peremptory orders to disperse the crowds, the attention of those the sun were starting from the dark pavilion who now ruled in Ghent was called to the of the night, to run his race of glory through case of the ruffians taken red-handed in the the long course of a summer's day; but the crime they had committed. The ancient laws wind, whistling keenly through the woods, of their activity. The young citizen, however, of the city were hastily consulted; were found and ere daybreak the next morning the four persons who had acted the most prominent of his jerkin, and dragged him towards the part in the death of the eschevins had tasted the same fate before the town hall of Ghent.

> With a sternness which formed no part of his original nature, but which grows sadly and destructively upon the human heart in such scenes of excitement and violence, Albert Maurice himself saw the decree of the municipal The council carried into effect ere he trod his way homeward. As soon as the execution was over, he returned to his dwelling; and exthe last eight and forty hours, he cast himself

CHAPTER XXIII.

OLIVIER LE DAIN.

WE must now, once more, change the scene, and, leaving Ghent to proceed step by step through all the mazes of anarchy and confusion which are sure for a time to succeed the overthrow of established authority, we must trace the events which were occurring to some of the other personages connected with this true history.

Once more, then, let us turn to the forest of Hannut, which now, in the depth of winter, offered a very different scene from that which it had displayed either in the full summer or the brown autumn. It was early in the morning of the 20th of January, and, except on the scattered beeches which, mingling here and there with the oak, and the elm, and the birch, retained their crisp brown leaves longer than any of the other trees, not a bough in the wood, but, stripped of all that ornamented it in the summer, was covered with a fine white coating of glistening frost-work. Little snow, indeed, covered the ground, and that which had fallen was too hard frozen to have any tenacity; but,-drifted about the forest in a fine white powder, lodged here and there

The morning was as clear and bright as if and tingling on the cheeks of the early forester, told that the sharp reign of winter was in the turer.

acmé of its power.

In a wide, open, grassy spot, at about half without you,' replied the chief. a mile from the high road to Louvain, were collected, on the morning to which I refer, about a dozen of our good friends the green in his way. riders. One or two were on horseback, but the greater part had dismounted, and were employing themselves in all the various ways which men devise to warm themselves on a winter's morning. They were evidently waiting for some one, and though the people who are watched for by such gentry, are not generally in the most enviable situation in the world, yet, on the present occasion, the freebooters seemed to have no hostile purpose in view, and spoke of the person they expected as one of themselves.

'Cold work he will have of it, Master Matthew,' said one of the adventurers, addressing the florid white-haired old man, whom we have had occasion to notice somewhat particularly in the cavern.

'By my faith!' replied the other, 'when anything disagreeable is to be done, he does not spare himself.

'Ay, but such is the leader for us,' replied the other. 'Think you he will be long? It is mighty cold, and the horses are half frozen.'

'Hark!' rejoined his companion; 'that clatter may answer your question. By the Lord! he is coming down the hill at a fearful rate, for so slippery as it is. I trust he is not pursued. Stand to your arms, my men, and be ready to mount.

As he spoke, the sound of a horse's feet at full gallop was heard through the clear frosty air; and, in a moment after, along the little road-which wound away from the open space where the adventurers were collected over the side of a pretty steep acclivity-was seen a man on horseback, darting down toregard to the sharpness of the descent, or the you may. slipperiness of the road. He was armed like themselves, but with the distinction, that in- plied Von Halle, looking up with an inquirstead of the open basinet, or round steel cap, without visor, which they wore, his head was which was down.

He drew not a rein till he was in the midst I only thought, if I were to die, I would of them; then, with one slight touch, checked his horse and vaulted to the ground. The haste in which he had arrived was now equalled by the rapidity of his words, as he gave out a number of different orders to the men who surrounded him, clearly and precisely, but with a celerity which showed that no time was to be lost.

'Matthew, my good lieutenant,' he said. laying his hand upon the shoulder of the old man, 'who is the fittest to send to Germany, on an errand to a prince?'

'Why not myself?' demanded the adven-

'Because I want you here, and cannot do

'Well, then, send Walter there,' rejoined the old man; 'he is a Frenchman and courtly

'Courtly, and honest too,' added the Vert Gallant, 'which is a wonder. There, Master Walter, take that letter to the Bishop of Triers. You will find him at Cologne with the bishop of that city. There, mount and be gone! you know your way. Here is a purse of gold to pay your expenses. The Bishop will send you on to the Archduke. The Germans are frugal -- therefore be not you over-fine; yet spare not the florins, where it may do honour to him that sent you. Away!'

You, good Matthew, yourself,' continued the Vert Gallant, 'speed like lightning to Ghent; but cast off your steel jacket, and robe me yourself like the good burgher of a country town. Seek out your old friend Martin Fruse: confer with him, and with his nephew Albert Maurice; they are now all powerful in Ghent. Bid them beware of Louis King of France. Tell them it is his purpose to force the Princess Mary into a marriage with his puny son, and to make her yield her fair lands into his hand, that he himself may seize them all when death lays hold upon his sickly boy. Bid them oppose it by all means, but by none more than by delay. Risk not your person, however; and if you cannot speak with them in safety, write down the message, and have it given by another hand. You, Frank Von Halle-you are bold and shrewd, though you have but little speech; follow Matthew Gournay, habited as his man! but when you are within the walls of Ghent. find out some way of speech with the Princess; and whether in public or in private, give her that ring, with this small slip of wards them, without the slightest apparent paper. Then leave the city as quickly as 'I doubt me it will be sure death,' re-ing glance.

'What! you afraid, Von Halle!' exclaimed go home first, and, with Martin of Gravelines and Dick Drub the Devil, would drink out the pipe of sack I bought ;-pity it should be wasted.

'Keep it for another time,' replied the Vert Gallant, 'for, by my faith, your errand to Ghent will never stop your drinking it.'

'Well, well; if I die, tell the other two to finish it,' replied the man; 'pity it should be wasted;' and so sprang on his horse.

'Hold, Matthew,' cried the Vert Gallant, as the two soldiers were about to depart without more words; 'meet me five days hence height to screen him from the observation of in the wood between Swynaerde and Deynse. So lose no time. You know the red cross near Astene.'

The two instantly rode off; and the Vert Gallant then turned to the others, and continued his orders, for marching the whole force he had under his command-which seemed to be considerable-into the woods in the neighbourhood of Ghent.

Those woods, though then very extensive, and covering acres of ground which are now in rich cultivation, were nevertheless too small to afford perfect shelter and concealparts of the country. All this, however, was bands that were then rife. foreseen and arranged by the leader of the free companions; and it is probable that he for two stout archers armed at all points led also trusted to the distracted state of the the way,-but at the head of the principal country-throughout which anything like body, appeared a small, dark, ill-featured general police was, for the time, at an endfor perfect immunity in his bold advance to display of splendour in his apparel sufficed the very gates of the capital of Flanders.

All his orders were speedily given, and one by one his companions left him, as they received their instructions, so that at length he stood alone. He paused for a moment on the spot, patting the neck of his strong fiery horse; and, -as men will sometimes do when they fancy themselves full of successful designs, and are excited by the expectations of great events, -addressing to the nearest object of the brute creation, those secret outbreakings of the heart, which he might have feared to trust in the unsafe charge of his fellow men.

'Now, my bold horse, now,' he exclaimed, 'the moment is come, for which, during many a long year, I have waited and watched! The star of my house is once more in the ascendant, and the reign of tyranny is at an endlet him who dares, stand between me and my right, for not another hour will I pause till justice is fully done.'

distant murmur came along, so mingled with the whistling of the wind, that he had to listen for some moments before he could ascertain whether it proceeded from the mere increased waving of the boughs occasioned by the gale rising, or whether it was the distant sound of a number of persons travelling along the road which he had just passed.

He was soon satisfied; and as he clearly travelling. distinguished voices, and the jingling tramp turning slightly from the high road, they had of a travelling party of that day, he sprang followed the foot-marks of the Vert Gallant's upon his horse, leaped him over a small brook charger; taking them for those left by the that trickled half-congealed through the grass, horse of an avant-courier, who had been and plunged into a deep thicket beyond, the despatched to prepare for them at the next the passengers.

The party whose tongues he had heard soon came on. It comprised about thirty people, all well armed, and dressed splendidly, bearing the straight cross, which at that time distinguished France from Burgundy. splendid apparel of the whole body, the number of the men at arms, of which it was principally composed, together with certain signs of peaceful dispositions on their own part, evinced at once, that the cavalcade which came winding along the road, consisted of some envoy from France and his escort, ment for such a large body of adventurers as furnished with those letters of safe-conduct had long tenanted the vaster and less fre- which guarded them from any hostile act on quented forest-tracks near Hannut, unless the part of the government of the country which guarded them from any hostile act on the entire band were subdivided into many through which they passed, but prepared to smaller ones, and distributed through various resist any casual attacks from the lawless

Not exactly at the head of the cavalcade,man, whose person even an extraordinary not to render anything but what it was, insignificant. Velvet and gold and nodding plumes could do nothing in his favour; and the only thing which made his appearance in any degree remarkable, was an air of silent, calm, and determined cunning, which had in it something fearful from its very intensity. One gazed upon him as on a serpent, which, however small and powerless in appearance, inspires terror in much mightier things than itself, from the venom of its fangs.

He rode on quietly, speaking little to any one; and that which he did say, was all uttered in a calm, soft, insinuating tone, which corresponded well with the expression of his countenance. The rest of the party laughed and talked with much less ceremony and restraint than the presence of so dignified a person as an ambassador might have required, had he been by state and station fit to have inspired respect. Such seemed not to be the case in the present instance; and While he was thus speaking, a sort of slight, though not one word on any other than the most commonplace subjects, passed amongst the followers of the Count de Meulan, -for so the ambassador was called,-yet their light laughter and gay jokes, breaking forth every moment close to his ear, were anything but ceremonious or reverential.

Some little difficulty seemed now to occur in regard to the road that the party were It appeared that hitherto, on bushes and trees of which were of sufficient town. When they found, however, that the steps turned into the savannah, and lost them- cisely the same on both parts, the combat turned to the high road.

Their whole proceedings, however, had almost before they were out of sight, the Vert Gallant emerged from his concealment, and, with a laugh which rang with contempt, turned his horse's head and galloped away.

The Count de Meulan-or, in other words, Olivier le Dain, the barber of Louis XI., whom that monarch had raised from the lowest class for the basest qualities, and whom he now sent as ambassador, to treat with the young heiress of Burgundy, and to intrigue with her subjects, -had hardly proceeded two hours on the high road, when a fat rolling monk of the order of St. Francis, mounted the rear of the ambassador's escort, and the men at arms, besought their leave to should prove successful, in the execution of travel as far as they went on the road to Ghent under their protection, alleging that the country was in such a disturbed state, without a monk in his train.

Father Barnabas, whom we have seen given him protection; and by many a jolly a suspicion in the mind of Olivier le Dain, Even the barber Count himself, whose more straightforwardly. sensual propensities were only restrained by one occasion he felt disposed to put some able to sit his horse. The ambassador delittle house in which they lodged, he eyed the hold. Could not the monk guide them? thing that we see will be difficult to discover. world before.'

But the monk was at least his match; and if the weapons with which they engaged in Barnabas; but I offer no service before it is the keen contest of their wits were not pre- asked. There is a proverb against it, man.

selves in a number of others, a halt im-resembled that of the elephant and rhinoceros, mediately took place; and, after a short —whenever Oliver the wicked strove to seize consultation, by order of the ambassador, the the monk and close with him, his antagonist whole party wheeled round, and wisely re- ran under him and gored him. Thus, when, by some casual words, the envoy thought he had discovered that his companion was a been watched by one they knew not of; and native of Saarvelt, and suddenly put the question to him at once, the other replied,-No, no; I only remember it well, on account of a barber's boy who was there, and whose real name was-pho! I forget his real name; but he is a great man now-a-days, and has held a basin under the nose of a king.

The quiet, unconscious manner in which this was said, left Olivier le Dain, with all his cunning, in doubt whether the jolly friar really recognised in him the barber's boy of Saarvelt, or whether the allusion had been merely accidental; but he resolved not to question any more a person of such a memory, on a sleek mule, the picture of himself, joined and possibly determined to take care that the most effectual stop should be put to its exerentering into jovial conversation with some of cise in future, if these plans regarding Ghent which he was now engaged.

Too wise, however, to show any degree of harshness towards the monk at the time, -a that even a poor brother like himself could proceeding which would have pointed home not travel in any safety. The light-hearted the sarcasm for his men at arms, on whose Frenchmen easily granted his request, ob- faces he thought he had remarked a sneering serving, in an under tone to each other, that smile as the other spoke, -he allowed good Oliver the Devil-such was the familiar cog- Father Barnabas to travel on under his escort. nomen of the respectable personage they meditating a lesson for him when he arrived followed,—could not in all conscience travel at his journey's end, which some might have thought severe. In the meantime, as they travelled on, there was about the monk a sortbefore, no sooner found himself added to the of subdued triumph-a self-satisfied chuckle suite of the ambassador, than he employed in his laugh, especially when he jested the those means he well knew would make his gay and boasting Frenchmen upon their arms society agreeable to the men at arms who had and their exploits—that occasionally wakened carouse, and many a licentious bacchanalian whose own conduct was far too crooked for song he soon won favour on all hands, him to believe that any one else could act

Still no danger appeared; and the party his cunning, found no fault with the merry arrived in perfect safety, within about four friar, whose sly and cutting jests, combined leagues of Ghent. There, after pausing for with the sleek and quiet look of stupidity supper at an inn, it was found, on preparing which always accompanied them, found means to resume their journey, and enter the city to draw up even his lip into a smile, that that night, that the person who had hitherto might have been mistaken for a sneer. On guided them, was so drunk as hardly to be shrewd questions to worthy father Barnabas, as manded a guide of the host, but none could to his situation and pursuits; and even began be found; and the worthy keeper of the inn to do so on the second night of their journey, answered, with true Flemish coolness, that he as, occupying the best seat by the fire in the would not spare any one of his own houseimpenetrable fat countenance before him with he demanded. If his eyes served him, he the sort of curiosity one feels to pry into any- had seen his broad face in that part of the

'Ay, marry can I, my son,' replied Father

deep importance, and minutes were of the appointed. At the very first whistle, the friar utmost consequence to success, Olivier le had slipped, unperceived, from his sleek mule, Dain, though by no means fond of riding at and, passing under the animal's belly, was night, and not at all prepossessed in favour of no longer to be seen; and before the luckless the monk, consented to accept him as a ambassador could reach the road, which led guide; and the party accordingly set out. away to the bridge, he found it occupied by By a whispered arrangement between the armed men. To whichever side he turned, respectable Count de Meulan and the Captain the same sight presented itself; and even on of his escort, however, a large part of the the highway leading to Ghent he found a still armed attendants rode on at a sufficient dis- stronger party interposed between him and tance before, to enable Olivier to make his the first division of his escort. He thus stood retreat if he heard any attack upon this avant- in the midst of the open square of the cross guard, while the monk, riding between two road, accompanied by about twelve attentroopers, close to the worthy barber, was held dants, and surrounded by a body of advenas a sort of hostage for the security of the turers which could not be less than one or road, on which he was about to pilot them. two hundred, but which fear and darkness Father Barnabas, whether he perceived any- magnified into a much greater number. The thing strange in the array in which they set scene and situation were by no means pleasant. out, or not, made no opposition; and jogged with various choice allusions to barbers, and basins, and beards, much more to the gratification of the men at arms than of Olivier le

Thus proceeded the cavalcade, till they reached the little wood of Swynaerde, near Merebek, where the road from Alost, in ancient days, crossed the Scheldt, over a wooden bridge, where a certain pontage was charged upon each horse that passed. Here the mind of the barber ambassador was in some degree relieved, by hearing from the toll-taker, that all was quite quiet and safe, though six good miles still lay between him and Ghent, and that through a dark wood of tall trees. At the distance of about a mile from the bridge, was a red cross, marking the direction of four different roads; which there intersected each other; and the whole party paused, as it was too dark to read the directions thereon inscribed, to receive the instructions of the monk.

Straight on! straight on! cried Father Barnabas;—and the first part of the escort moved forward, though somewhat nearer to the rest of the body than before; but the moment they had again resumed their march there was a low sharp whistle, and a sound of rushing and rustling all around them, Olivier le Dain, who was already following the van, drew in his rein; and the whistle, repeated a thousand times in different parts of the wood round about, showed him at once that his party was beset Fear certainly was the predominant feeling in his mind; but even that very absorbing sensation did not banish a passion equally strong; and, while he turned his horse's, head to fly back to the bridge with all speed, he did not fail to say, in a voice but little changed from its ordinary stern voice of some one advancing from the calm and sustained tone,—'We are betrayed! wood. 'Get off your horse, Sir Barber; you kill the monk!' But both Olivier's purpose of shall know my pleasure with you, when it

As the affairs he had to transact were of escape, and his desire of vengeance, were dis-Not a sound was to be heard, but the echo of on contentedly upon his mule, chattering horses' feet ringing over the hard frozen gaily as he went, and seasoning his discourse ground,—from which he justly inferred that the advanced party of his escort, by whom he was neither loved nor respected, finding themselves infinitely over-matched, had galloped off, leaving him to his fate ;-and nothing was to be seen in the darkness of the night, but the black trunks of the trees, slightly relieved by the colour of the ground, which was covered by a thin drift of snow, while a number of dim human forms appeared, occupying all the different roads; and a multi-tude of faint dull spots of fire, drawn in a complete circle round him, showed the ambassador that the slow matches of the arquebusiers, into whose hands he had fallen, were prepared against resistance.

For a moment or two not a word was spoken; but at length a voice not far from him exclaimed, 'Lord a' mercy! Only to think of the barber's boy of Saarvelt coming ambassador to Ghent! Lack a day! lack a day, Noll! lack a day! thou art become a mighty great man! Thou hast lathered and shaved to some purpose, ha, ha, ha!' And the voice of the monk was drowned in his own laughter, the contagious merriment of whose thick plum porridge sounds instantly affected all around; and the whole forest rang and echoed to the peals.

'What would ye, fair sirs?' demanded the soft silken tones of Olivier le Dain. laughter be all ye seek, laugh on; but let me pass upon my way. If it be gold ye want, there, take my purse; I make you welcome

'A fool and his money!' cried the monk; snatching the purse. 'But, 'faith! Master Noll, the barber, it is generous of you to give what you cannot keep unless we like it.

'Cease your fooling, monk!' cried the suits me to tell it. And now answer me! How dare you, a low mechanical slave, presume to undertake a mission to the Duchess of Burgundy, without one drop of noble blood in your veins?'

'Your pardon, fair sir,' replied Olivier, dismounting slowly, and standing in an attitude of deprecation, before the tall, commanding figure by whom he was addressed;—'your pardon; I was rendered noble by my sovereign Lord the King, for the very purpose, as his observations in the command of the command o his letters patent will show.

'Faith! the letters patent must be miraculous ones, that could ennoble one drop of your slave's blood,' replied the Vert Gallant. 'There, take him away! Treat him not ill; but keep him safe and fast. Search his person, his servants, and his sumpter horses. Examine well the stuffings of the saddles, and the paddings of their coats; and bring every paper and parchment you may find.'

'But listen to me, fair sir! Only hear me! entreated Olivier le Dain. 'Surely you will not show such treatment to an ambassador. My papers and my person are sacred in every Christian land.

'Pshaw!' cried the Vert Gallant. 'When Louis, King of France, so far forgets what is due to a Princess, as to send to the heiress of Burgundy a mean, cunning barber, as an ambassador, he can only expect that others will also forget the character with which he chooses to invest his lackey. Besides, what is it to me that you are ambassador to Burgundy? You are no ambassador to me. I am duke of the forests; and when you come as envoy to me, you shall have forest cheer. Away with him, and do my bidding!

Closely guarded, but well treated, Olivier le Dain and his attendants were detained for some days in the woods near Ghent, during the greater part of which time, though occasionally compelled to sleep in a hut of boughs, they resided generally in a small lonely house, which had belonged in former days to the forester.

At length, one morning, suddenly, while the twilight was still grey, the ambassador and his followers were called from their repose, and placed upon the horses which brought them. All their apparel and jewels were restored, as well as their arms; and of the treasure, which the barber had brought with him, for the purpose of bribing the populace of Ghent, a sufficient portion was left in his possession, to maintain his dignity, but not to effect the object he had intended.

He was then told to follow his own course, for that he was free to come or go; and with all speed he turned his rein towards Ghent, at which place he arrived in safety, though seven days after the period which he had fixed for his coming.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE PROMISE CLAIMED.

In the mean time, many events had occurred within the walls of the city of Ghent, of which some account must be given, though perhaps it may be necessary to follow the same desultory manner in which they are related in shrewd old Philip de Commines and pompous Jean de Molinet.

The quelled tumult, the extinguished fire, and the prompt justice done upon some of the incendiaries, spread in a thousand shapes through the town; and as, whenever Fame has marked a hero for her own, she never fails to load him with many more honours than his due, Albert Maurice had soon acquired the reputation of a thousand miracles of skill, and courage and judgment, far beyond the acts he had really performed. Thus, when, after a brief sleep and a hasty repose, he issued forth from his house the next morning, and rode on to the town-house, he found the people-on whose wrath for their thwarted passions he had fully counted -ready, on the contrary, to shout gratulations and plaudits on his path. At the townhouse, the syndics and notables of all the trades had already assembled, and the druggist Ganay was in the very act of proposing that an address of thanks and applause should be voted to the young burgher for his noble and courageous conductof the preceding evening. Albert Maurice, however, was not to be blinded; and even when the druggist was declaiming vehemently against the outrages of the foregoing night, and lamenting that the populace had dealt upon the eschevins without due judgment by the law, the eye of the young citizen fixed upon him with a glance of keen reproach, which Ganay at once translated, and translated rightly-' You have deceived me.'

To have done so, however, was no matter of shame to the dark and artful man who was speaking; and, as their eyes met, a slight smile of triumphant meaning curled his lip, while, with a fresh burst of eloquence, he called upon the assembly to testify their admiration of the man who had saved the city from pillage and conflagration. The address of thanks was carried by acclamation; and Albert Maurice soon found that it was the determination of the more active part of the citizens, under the immediate influence of Ganay, to carry forward, with eager rapidity, all those bold measures which would deprive the sovereigns of any real power for the future, and rest it entirely in the hands of the people-or rather, in the hands of whatever they were called, and extraordinary powers gratitude from Mary of Burgundy. were entrusted to them. strong attempt was made to raise to it a fierce peared greater than they really were, from the power of all the people of Flanders? A total want of any restraints of feeling and steps more, and your hand may seize the moral principle, to limit the field in which they were exercised.

Some one, however luckily proposed the name of worthy Martin Fruse; and his nomination, seconded by the eloquent voice of his you; and you must on, whether you will or nephew, was instantly acquiesced in by all. A not.' nephew, was instantly acquiesced in by all. A slight cloud passed over the brow of the druggist, as he found his power likely to be counter-balanced by the influence of one who, if he possessed no other quality to render him great, had at least that rectitude of feeling, which was a fearful stumbling-block in the way of crooked designs. But unchangeable determination of purpose, and unscrupulous exercise of means, had rendered the druggist so often successful in things which seemed hopeless, that he bore, with scarcely a care, any change of circumstances, confident of finding some path to his object in the

After one of those noisy and tumultuous rejoined Albert Maurice. assemblies, in the course of which, though no business is transacted with calm reason, an infinity of acts are performed by impulse, the meeting at the town house broke up; and while Martin Fruse returned to his dwelling on foot, as was his invariable custom, Albert Maurice and the druggist mounted their horses, and rode slowly homeward. Their conversation was long and rapid-too long, indeed, for transcription here; but the commencement of it must not be omitted, even for the sake of brevity.

Maurice, as soon as they were in some degree free from the crowd.

'I have!' was the calm reply of the druggist. 'You are ungrateful, Albert. You have never thanked me for it. What, you would pretend you do not see cause for thanks!

person had courage, energy, and talent, to hands, the council must have condemned snatch it from their grasp, and retain it in his those foul vultures who have so long preyed Twenty-six eschevins, together with upon us. Ay, I say must; and then whose the lieutenant-bailli, and three pensioners, name, but that of Albert Maurice, must have were immediately elected by the citizens, to stood amongst others in the order for their replace those who had been massacred, and death? As I have managed it, the severity to administer the law; but the grand bailli was no act of yours. You have offended none and chief pensioner were still to be elected, -no, not even the Princess; and, on the and Albert Maurice with surprise heard the contrary, you have had the means of adding, determination of the people to confound those in one night, more to your fame, than your two high offices in his own person. From whole life has won before. You have had an the body of magistrates, three persons were opportunity of winning honour and respect selected, as a president and two consuls, as from commons and from nobles, and love and The president farther, have you not, in one night, in consenamed at once was the chief officer of the quence of acts with which you accuse me alcity, Albert Maurice; and Ganay, the drug-most as a crime, have you not climbed to the gist, was added as one of the consuls. The very height of power in your native land?—third office was not so easily filled; and a ay, I say the height of power, for who is there, be he Duke, or Count, or Prince, who and brutal man, whose talents perhaps aphas so much authority as he who sways the peared greater than they really were, from the power of all the people of Flanders? A few

'.The what?' demanded Albert Maurice, as the other paused.

No matter,' replied the druggist. 'The gates of ambition are cast wide open before

'Ha! and who shall force me?' demanded

Albert Maurice.

'Fate !- Destiny !' replied the druggist. 'Tis many years ago, and you were then a mere boy; but I remember your fate was predicted in the forest of Hannut by that gloomy old lord, whose only commune, for many a year, had been with the bright stars. 'Twas one night when we fell accidentally into the hands of the free companions, and he foretold that you should go on from power to power, successfully through life; and that no one should check you but yourself.'

'And do you believe in such vain dreams?'

'I believe,' replied the druggist, gravely, 'that our lot through life is immutably fixed from the cradle to the grave; that, like a wild horse, we may foam and plunge, or, like a dull jade, plod onward at a foot pace—but that the firm rider, Fate, still spurs us on upon the destined course; and when the stated goal is won, casts down the bridle on our neck, and leaves us to repose. I believe, too, that the stars, as well as many other things, may tell, to those who study them, events to come; for depend upon it, every-Ganay, you have deceived me, said Albert thing throughout the universe fits closely, like the blocks cut for a perfect arch; so that, from the form and position of the neighbouring stones, a person, who has deeply studied, may tell to a certainty the shape and size of any other.

Albert Maurice mused for a moment over Had not the populace taken it into their own the confession of this strange creed, and its

the old lord say concerning me?'

arose, he said, - 'Ganay, you have deceived me; and not for my interest, but for your own revenge. You have worked your will; and I trust that you are now sated. Better for us both to labour together as far as may be, than stand in the very outset face to face as foes. Are you contented with the blood already shed?

'There must be one more!' said the druggist resolutely.

'And who do you aim at now?' demanded the young citizen, with no small loathing and horror towards his companion; but yet with a conviction that, by some means, he would accomplish his purpose.

'It matters not,' replied Ganay; 'but set your mind at ease. The man to whom I point is less an enemy to myself than an enemy to the state; and I give you my promise that I will practise nought against his life but with your consent. So guilty is he, and so convinced shall you be of his guilt, that your own hand shall sign the warrant for his death. the blood shed last night is all that must be shed to effect the purposes you seek, sadly, sadly do you deceive yourself. Prepare to bid it flow like water, or betake you to a monastery! Ambition joined to faint-hearted pity, is like a tame lion at a show, led about by a woman.'

'But there is such a thing as patriotism,' replied Albert Maurice; yet he named the word but faintly, compared with the tone he would have given it three days before.

'Ay,' said the druggist; 'patriotism! The first step to ambition—but that stage is past.

Well did Ganay know that there exists no means of persuading a human being to any course of action, so powerful as by convincing him it is inevitable. To do so, however, there must be probability as a basis; and Ganay had watched too closely the most minute turns of his companion's behaviour during many months, not to divine the spark of ambition lying half smothered at the bottom of his heart. Nor had the effect of Mary of Burgundy's eyes upon the colour and the voice of Albert Maurice been lost upon the keen spirit that followed him; and he fancied he beheld an easy method of bending him to his own purpose. He saw, indeed, that, if either by love, or any other means, he could fan that spark into a flame, he must leave him to run his course without a struggle, or a hope to deprive him of the prize; nay, that he must illustration, and then demanded.—' What did new authority in the land, on the basis of that they were about to overthrow. But Ganay The druggist repeated his former words; was not ambitious of aught but avarice and and his young companion again mused for a revenge; and he soon perceived that these brief space. Then suddenly bringing back two master passions of his soul must be the conversation to the matter in which it gratified by Albert Maurice in his ascent to power. As he rode on, he spoke long of their future prospects. He cast away at once the enthusiastic cant he had at one time assumed towards him of patriotism and the entire abnegation of self; and, in order to habituate his mind fully to the dreams of ambition, he spoke of them as things already determined and to be. But still, to smooth the transition, he failed not to point out the mighty benefits that a ruler with a truly liberal heart might confer upon his people—it mattered not what he was called-governor, lord, duke, prince, or king. As for a pure republic, the land was not yet in a state fit for it, he said; but what a boona mighty boon-might not that man grant to the whole world, who, starting up from amongst the people, were to rule them for their own happiness alone, and to show to other monarchs the immense advantages of such a

'But if you speak of this land,' replied Albert Maurice, in whose heart he had dis-But, oh! Albert Maurice, if you believe that covered the unfortified spot, - but if you speak of this land, how can any man so start up, without tearing her inheritance from the gentlest, the noblest of beings?'

'By one means alone,' replied Ganay, in a grave decided tone; 'by uniting her fate with his own.

Albert Maurice, thrown off his guard by so bold and straightforward an allusion to that which was passing in his own heart, suddenly drew in his reins, and glanced his eye over the countenance of the druggist, to see if there were no sneer at the presumption of his very dreams, hidden beneath the calm tone the other assumed. But all was tranquil, and even stern; and, after a momentary pause, the young burgher replied, though with a flushed and burning cheek,—'If, as we know her to be, she is so gentle, and noble, and kind-hearted, as you admit, why not leave her to rule her hereditary lands by the dictates of her generous will?'

'What! before a year be over,' replied Ganay, 'to give her hand, and with it the wealth, and welfare, and happiness of her people, to some of the proud tyrants under which the country groans-or, at the instigation of her intriguing ministers, to bestow the whole upon some foreign prince, who will come amongst us without one sympathy, to grind into the dust the stranger subjects given him like serfs, as a part of his wife's portion!

Is this what you would have?'

Albert Maurice was silent, but not so aid him with his whole cunning to raise up a Ganay; and, as they proceeded, with poisonous eloquence he poured forth every argument, For the latter object, he felt that it was necesto show both the necessity and the facility of sary to bury deep in his own heart the aspirathe course he suggested. He cited Artevelte tions which rose within it, till manifold comas an instance of what talented ambition had munings, service, and tenderness, should have accomplished in that very city, and in an age ripened the esteem in which he saw he was when all the institutions of feudal pride were held into warmer feelings. Thus he pondered, a thousand-fold stricter than they had since till, before he was aware, schemes were formed become, He depicted him, now a lackey in a noble house in France, and then a mead brewer in Ghent, and then a popular leader, of England, treating as a prince with Philip of France, waging war at the head of mighty armies, and balancing the fate of Europe by his power. He had fallen, at length, he said, it was true; but he had fallen by his vices and his follies; and as far as virtues, talents, man to whom he then spoke? The one was a lackey risen from the lowest order of the state, the other sprung from the highest class of the burghers of the first commercial city in the north of Europe; burghers who already ranked almost with nobility, and who, in fact, should rank far higher.

With the skill of a practised musician, whose finger lights with nice precision on all the tones and half tones of his instruments, Ganay found means to touch every feeling in the bosom of the young burgher, and make every chord vibrate with the sound that he desired. True it is, indeed, that the heart of Albert Maurice was not one to have been thus lowed the arrival of these princes in the worked upon, had not the feelings been already there; and the task of his companion,an easy one in comparison,-was merely to was moving heaven and earth to obtain the excite those feelings into stronger action.

At length they reached the door of his own dwelling; and Albert Maurice alighted from his horse, without asking the druggist to do so too; but Ganay rode on contented, for he saw that he had given the young citizen matter for thoughts which he sought to indulge in private, and he desired no better. Nor had his words failed to sink deep. Albert Maurice, indeed, passed rapidly over, in his own mind, all the intermediate steps; but there rested behind, as a result, the proud, the inspiring conviction that all which he chose to snatch at was within his grasp -that in one single Albert Maurice and to the druggist Ganay, day he had reached a height of power, from which it was but a step to the side of Mary of Burgundy; and the conviction was a dangerous one for his virtue and his peace. Much, however, was still to be done; and he sat knew, and whose designs they did not suspect. down to revolve all that must be attempted, Of neither of the parties at the court did to render the daring hopes of mingled love Albert Maurice at first entertain much fear; and ambition, with which his own heart beat, for he felt sure that the heart of Mary of Bura passion of the people—to crush, or scatter, gundy, however tutored to sacrifice her own or circumvent the many rivals that must and will, would strongly revolt against either alliwould arise and to win the love of her upon ance, the one with a fierce and brutal sot, whose affections all his dreams were founded. the other with a sickly child. But tidings and deeds were prepared, which all eternity could not annul.

The following days passed much in the and then a companion of princes, seated be- same manner; but each day brought forward side the conquering and accomplished Edward to the light some of the many difficulties with which the young citizen would have to contend in his progress towards the great object before his eyes; but which, having calculated upon them from the first, he was prepared to meet as soon as they assumed a tangible form. During the course of that morning which courage, or accomplishments went, could followed the day of his elevation to the supreme Artevelte compete, for one hour, with the power in the city, the levy of a large body of troops was voted, and the entire command was assigned to himself; but, before night, the Lord of Ravestein, the Duke of Cleves, and the Bishop of Liege arrived, to counsel and support the Princess; and though each came separately, their trains, united, amounted to nearly a thousand men. A wary guard, however, was held upon the gates of Ghent; and only thirty attendants were allowed to pass within the walls in company with each of the noble visitors, while, much to the discontent of their lords, the rest were sent back to their various territories.

A new scene of intrigue immediately folpalace; and it soon reached the ears of Albert Maurice, that the Duke of Cleves hand of the orphan Princess of Burgundy for his son. Almost at the same time, good Martin Fruse received intelligence, from a quarter which we already know, that Louis XI. sought to unite France and Burgundy by an union between the heiress of Charles the Bold and his sickly child the Dauphin; and it soon became evident that Imbercourt and Hugonet, supported by the Lord of Ravestein, were eagerly pressing Mary to sacrifice her own feelings to the benefit of her country, and to bestow her hand upon the feeble boy.

Clear, however-most clear, it was, both to that while these parties contended for mastery, they must equally court the people of Ghent; and more especially must bow to the young citizen himself, whose power they all well speedily arrived, which made him fear that energies or his watchfulness; and he yielded Louis was already in the field; that Picardy ance might otherwise have been concluded. was full of the troops of France; and that his way from France to Ghent; and to show citizen.

the gates. but hourly tidings were received of the pro- gave her new courage to resist. gress of the French king, and of his unjust and all the ministers of the late duke saw his deceit, served painfully to deceive. proceedings in the same point of view; and yield to her fate, and, before her dominions the Dauphin. Mary nor her ministers dared to refuse.

Albert Maurice, however, suffered himself

force or terror would soon compel the un- to the pretensions of the Duke of Cleves in happy girl to yield herself to France. News favour of his son, only so far as might stay now reached him from an unknown hand, that the precipitate haste which the French alli-

With Imbercourt he clashed continually: Commines and Bourbon were advancing and the firm, calm reasoning of the minister along the line of the Somme. An ambassador, was constantly met and overpowered by the too, he was warned at the same time, was on fiery and brilliant eloquence of the young Nor was he, even in opposing her the young citizen that he was sent rather to faithful and her esteemed minister, without tamper with the people than to negotiate with deriving some encouragement from the eyes the Princess, or even with the municipal of Mary herself, whenever the discussion took council, copies of his commission and instruc- place in her presence: for though she both tions reached him from an unknown source, loved and reverenced the wise and gallant together with an assurance that some days friend of her father, who advocated, for her would yet elapse before he could appear at own interests, the proposed union with the Dauphin; yet to her heart that union was so The near approach of the ambassador, repugnant, that she could not but look with whom we have already seen delayed on his pleasure on every one who opposed it, nor journey, remained unknown in the palace: listen without delight to arguments which

Nor did Albert Maurice ever support the claims upon the whole inheritance of the late idea of her marriage with another; so that, Duke of Burgundy. The pretences he set while advancing his own design, and winning forth were so futile and absurd—so contrary both her gratitude and admiration, he was to every principle of law or justice—that every never found in opposition to her wishes; and one believed his sole motive was to force the still, when he appeared, she welcomed his heiress of Burgundy into an immediate mar- coming with a smile and with a look of pleariage with his son. Imbercourt, Hugonet, sure, which, without the slightest purpose of

Nevertheless, the Duke of Cleves made rapid incessantly besought the unhappy Mary to progress; and, not contented with the efforts of the young citizen to oppose the French were entirely incorporated with France, to alliance, he left no means untried to stimulate avert the misfortunes that must fall upon her- the people to support his own design. The self and her people, by yielding her hand to watchful eye of Albert Maurice was indeed upon him, but still his strides towards the ac-The same conclusion in regard to the mo- complishment of his schemes were more speedy tives of Louis XI. was drawn by the Duke of than the other had anticipated; and the cries Cleves; but the result on his own conduct he heard, when once riding towards the palace, was totally different. Instead of beseeching of 'Long live the Duke of Cleves! Long Mary to yield to necessity, he opposed such live his gallant son !' showed him at once that advice with determined and angry vehemence. it was time to raise up some barrier against He stigmatised Hugonet and Imbercourt as his pretensions. At the same time, he felt, traitors; and in order to destroy the powerful that to give even a slight support to the oppoparty opposed to his own views in the council site party might prove fatal to his hopes; and, of the Princess, he laid himself out to court after a long consultation with Ganay, he deterthe people; rode side by side with Albert mined to seek out some one who might openly Maurice through the streets of the city, amidst pretend to Mary's hand, and draw away the the shouts of the multitude; and, after having countenance of the people from the Duke of excited the municipal body to petition that Cleves; but whose pretensions would be even their president might have a seat in the pro- more repugnant, not only to herself, but to vincial council of Flanders, he himself pre- her ministers, her friends, and her nobles, sented the address, which he knew that neither than even his own might prove thereafter. But who was to be the man?

Accompanied by the crowd of attendants, not to be dazzled: and though joy inexpres- who now always followed his footsteps when sible thrilled at his heart at every triumphant he rode forth, as chief magistrate of Ghent, step he took in advance; though his whole Albert Maurice hastened to the palace, some soul rejoiced at the constant opportunity now minutes before the council met, and was adafforded him of daily communication with her mitted to the presence of the Princess, whose he dared to love; yet he allowed neither pas- smile gave him even a more glad reception sion nor success for a moment to relax his than ordinary. She was not alone, however, for besides her usual train of ladies, a page, a chamberlain, and a man dressed as a peasant, but whose scarred cheek told tales of warlike broils, stood before her when he entered.

'Oh! you are most welcome, Sir President,' said the Princess, 'and have come to afford me counsel at a good moment. Here is a ring just returned to me, which I gave some months ago to a stranger who saved me, I believe, from death, in a thunder-storm near Tirlemont. I promised, at the same time, that, on his sending it back, I would grant whatever he might ask, if it were consistent with my honour and my dignity. Look what he says on this slip of parchment-" He to whom the Duchess of Burgundy gave this ring, demands, as the boon of which it is a pledge, the instant liberation of Adolphus Duke of Gueldres, and his restoration to his own domains.'

Albert Maurice almost started; for there was a strange coincidence between the demand which the Princess had just read, and the thoughts which had been passing in his mind as he rode thither. 'Lady,' he said, 'it seems to me that there is but one counsel to be given to you. Your word is pledged; the liberation of the Duke of Gueldres-monster though he be-is consistent with your honour and dignity; and your promise must be fulfilled.

'You always judge nobly, Sir President,' replied the Princess; 'and I thank you now, and ever shall thank you, for supporting that which is just and generous, however contrary it may be to apparent interests.'

citizen, bending low to conceal the joy that sparkled in his eyes,—' believe me, that it shall ever be my endeavour to strive both to obtain your best interests, and those of the country, which are indeed inseparable; and I would ask you as a boon, through all the future-whatever you may see or think strange in my demeanour-to believe that your good and my country's are still the ceive the honour of his alliance as a matter of motive.

'I will-I will, indeed,' replied the Princess; 'for it would be hard to make me suppose that you, whom I have seen act so nobly in circumstances of personal danger and diffi-your sovereign.'

A slight flush passed over the cheek of Albert Maurice at such praise, It was not exlightest thoughts were seldom common-place that this land is united to the enemy of that

-but vaguely; and, after a few questions, addressed to the man who bore the ring, which he seemed unwilling to answer, the Princess rendered her promise to liberate the Duke of Gueldres definite, and the messenger was suffered to depart.

At the meeting of the council, which followed immediately, the matter was discussed and concluded, and the orders to set the Duke at liberty were instantly despatched. It was accompanied, however, by the express command of the Princess-whose abhorrence for that base, unnatural son, turbulent subject, and faithless friend, was unconcealed-that he should immediately retire to his own domains, and never present himself before her.

More important matters occupied the council also. New tidings had been received from the frontiers; and all those tidings were evil. No doubt could now exist, that while his principal officers were invading the Duchy of Burgundy in the east, Louis XI., with an overwhelming force, was marching onward towards Flanders, taking possession of all those fair lands which had descended to the unhappy Princess at the death of her father, and meeting with little opposition on his way. Already Abbeville had thrown open its gates. Ham, Bohaim, St. Quentin, Roye, and Mont-didier, had followed; and Peronne-proud, impregnable Peronne-had been yielded at the first summons.

Again the Lord of Imbercourt boldly and strongly urged the absolute necessity of propitiating the King of France, and arresting his farther progress, by the immediate union, 'Believe me, madam,' replied the young or at least affiancing, of the Princess of Bur-tizen, bending low to conceal the joy that gundy and the heir of the French crown. It was the only means, he said-it was the only hope of preserving any part of the dominions, which, by various events, had been united under the coronet of Burgundy; and was it not better, he asked, for the Princess to carry them as a dowry to her husband, than to come portionless to the same prince at last, and re-grace and favour?

'My Lords,' replied Albert Maurice, rising as soon as the other had sat down, 'already a thousand times have you heard my arguments against the base and ungenerous step proculty, would forget your honour and integ- posed; often have I shown, by reasoning, rity, when trusted by our countrymen and that the interests of France and Burgundy are as distinct as it is possible to conceive, and that centuries must elapse before they can be united. But, if such be the case with the actly that he knew himself undeserving of it, Duchy of Burgundy itself and all its imme-for he had laboured hard and successfully to diate dependencies, how much more so is it convince himself that his own aggrandise- the case with Flanders and Brabant? With ment, the welfare of the country-ay, and he England, the eternal enemy of France, has almost hoped, the happiness of Mary herself ever been our great commercial intercourse; -were inseparably united. He replied, how- to our friendship with England do we owe ever-not with words of course, for his our commercial existence; and the moment great country, that moment our wealth, our prosperity, our being as a distinct land, is at All this I have shown, taking a mere political view: but remembering that I spoke to knights and nobles, to men who can feel for national honour, and fear national eyes of all Christendom, the moment that your bold and gallant prince is dead, to truckle to his often worsted enemy; to yield to Louis the lands which Charles the Bold so stoutly maintained against him; and to give his daughter's hand to the son of that base foe, whose dark and traitorous intrigues effected, more than aught on earth, your sovereign's overthrow and death. Already have I demanded why, instead of all those degrading concessions, you do not prepare defences in the field, and, rather than talking of yielding tamely to an unjust tyrant, you do not go forth to encounter him with lance and sword, as in the days of the great Duke. But now I must use another language—language more bold and more decided-and say that Flanders, Hainault, and Brabant, will never consent to be the slaves of France.-France, who has so often wronged us, and whose efforts, vain as they have been, have never ceased to grasp at the dominion of these lands. More! I say—and by my voice the three united states now speak to the councils of Burgundy-that we will consider and pursue, as a false and perfidious traitor, bought with the gold of France to betray his lady's interest, that man, whoever he may be, who henceforth proposes the subjection of these lands to a French prince,'

The Duke of Cleves eagerly supported the bold speech of the young citizen, as did also the Bishop of Liege-more perhaps from personal hatred to Imbercourt, than from any real disapprobation of the French alliance, Warm and violent words passed on all parts; and the discussion had reached a pitch of dangerous turbulence, when it was announced that the Count de Meulan, envoy extraordinary from the King of France, had just entered the city, and taken up his abode at the principal inn of the place.

This news gave a different turn to the deliberations of the council; and after determining that the reception of the ambassador should take place the following day, it broke up; and its various members separated, with those feelings of personal animosity burning in their bosoms which have so often proved fatal to great designs.

CHAPTER XXV.

MARY BETRAYED.

disgrace, I have also pointed out the shame ABOUT seven o'clock at night, a post arrived the burning shame—that it would be in the in Ghent, bearing the unwelcome intelligence that Hesden, Montreuil, Boulogne, Cambray, and many other places, had yielded to the arms of France; that Philippe de Crèvecœur, the oldest and most tried servant of the House of Burgundy, had gone over to the enemy, and that Arras itself was lost to Flanders. Such were the tidings that reached Albert Maurice, while busily debating with Ganay, in a private chamber of the Hotel de Ville, the means of raising, as rapidly as possible, a large force for the defence of the country.

> The messenger delivered the sealed packets into the hands of the young President, with notice that they were of the utmost importance; but, ere he opened them, Albert Maurice dismissed the bearer calmly, and finished the phrase which his entrance had interrupted. He then broke the seals, and read; and as he proceeded, notwithstanding his great command over his own feelings, it was clear, from the contraction of his brow, and the quivering of his lip, that the tale therein written was anything but pleasing,

Casting them on the table, after a moment's deep thought, the young citizen laid his hand sternly upon the papers, and, approaching the lamp towards them, pointed to the fatal tidings from Arras, saying to his keen companion, - This is sad! this is terrible! We must, if possible, keep this from the knowledge of the council, till this pitiful ambassador has had his reply.'

Ganay read the contents of the papers over, word by word; then raising his eyes to the face of his companion, and compressing his thin, bloodless lips, he replied, calmly but sternly

- 'Imbercourt must die !'.

Albert Maurice started .- 'No, no! not so,' replied he; 'I am not one of those tigers, Ganay, to cross whose path is death. He may oppose me in the council; he may even thwart me in my plans; and yet not die, Ganay. But if he betray my country, his deed be upon his head. I will crush him with my heel, as I would a viper.'

'Imbercourt must die!' reiterated Ganay, in the same stern, determined tone he had used before. - He will betray your country and mine, - and he dies. I have marked him well. I see his plans. He, like the traitors who have gone over before, will sell his country to France for French gold; and he must die. The only difference between him and this Philippe du Crèvecœur is, that the one, less cunning than the other, went over with no-

net of all these states,

Never!' cried Albert Maurice, stung to the heart, as the other had intended, and striking his clenched hand upon the table; 'never! My head or his shall whiten in the wind over the battlements of Ghent, before such a sacrifice be consummated.

The moment he had spoken, however, he felt that he had given Ganay an advantage; and well understanding that the game between him and his subtle comrade was one that admitted of no oversight, and that he must be as much upon his guard with his apparent friend as with a declared enemy, he hastened to turn the conversation from a topic on which he could not speak wisely. 'We must think farther'—he said; 'we must think farther! In the meantime,' he added abruptly, 'see you to this messenger, that he do not spread his news abroad before the reception of the worthy ambassador, which Louis has deigned to send. I have that in yon cabinet, which shall overthrow, at a word, all that his cunning can advance, were he as cunning as the fiend whose name he takes. At the same time, Ganay, I must trust to your zeal also, my friend, for the skilful management of our other purpose. This Duke of Gueldres you must render popular with the citizens, and oppose him strongly to the Duke of Cleves. Not too far, however. I would equally divide between them the power that the Duke of Cleves at present holds entire. Better it were, nevertheless, that the people over favoured him of Gueldres, than the other; for he has no hope. Every noble in the land would rise up against him; and, at the worst it were but three passes of this steel'-and he touched the hilt of his sword-' to send him howling to the place he has so long deserved; and to win me the thanks of all the world, for ridding it of such a monster.

Notwithstanding all his care, Albert Maurice felt-and felt angrily-that the eager passions of his heart would burst forth and display more of his real feelings and emotions than he was willing to expose. Ganay smiled, too, as he listened; and with his smiles there was always mingled a degree of mockery of the person who excited them, which rendered their meaning very doubtful.

'May I trust you?' demanded Albert

Maurice sternly.

'You may,' answered the druggist, 'doubt me not; for with you, Albert Maurice, I am more frank a thousand-fold than with any other human being. We are like two men playing one game of chess, against a whole host of adversaries; and it is necessary that thing but his own brute courage to sell; we should see each other's moves; while this Imbercourt, take my word for it, game I know, Albert, and mine I do not seek will carry, as merchandise to Louis of France, to conceal from you; for it would be both use-the hand of Mary of Burgundy, and the coro-less and fatiguing. I will, then, do your bidding in regard to these two men of Cleves and Gueldres; and so play them off against each other, that they shall both combine, in their dissensions, to raise you to the height of your ambition.

He spoke boldly; and Albert Maurice felt that, for once at least, he spoke truly; though, perhaps, he saw, that notwithstanding they were in some sort partners in the game, as Ganay had depicted them, yet they were playing for different stakes, and might soon find that they had different interests.

'And when this game is won, Ganay,' said he calmly, after a brief pause- 'this game in which you and I stand as partners,say, are we to turn round the board, and singly play one short game more, against each other?-Ha! is it not so?'

'No; on my life!' replied Ganay, with a degree of fervour unusual with him .- 'No; on my life, young man. I have my passions, like my neighbours; but I am without ambition. Do you, too, believe me without a touch of feeling? You have shown me kindness in times past: you once saved the life of one that is now no more; three years ago you held my head when it throbbed with fever, when we were together on the shores of the Adriatic: and if you cross not my purpose -if you oppose not the stronger passion, which guides, and struggles with, and masters all—you shall find that my gratitude is only second to my revenge. Even more!' he added, resuming his ordinary air of calm shrewdness; 'I can be even grateful for those things which I accomplish by your means—though without your will; and our common efforts for one great purpose bind us together more firmly than you think. So, now, farewell !-but remember, I tell you Imbercourt is a traitor-and he must die!'

'If he be a traitor, die most certainly he shall,' replied Albert Maurice; 'but in regard to that man, I mistrust my own motives too much to rely on my own judgment. More, Ganay !-still more !- I mistrust your motives too; and I will not rely on your judgment either. Nay, protest not! I see your bitter persevering hatred of that man as clearly as if your bosom were of glass, though I see not the occasion of it. But it matters not what be the occasion.—I doubt myself, and I doubt you; and others, more impartial than either you or I, shall judge him, though, God knows, I know no cause of enmity you can have towards him .- So now, farewell.

Ganay's lip curled with a very mingled expression, as Albert Maurice pronounced the last words, but he made no reply; and leaving the young citizen, he proceeded to

ference with Maillotin du Bac.

upon his bed, soon found the sweet sleep of so many persons. fatigue; nor did he ever stir from the precincts of the building. No one saw him with- calmly heard a paper read, which she felt was out its gates; no one held conference with binding her to misery for life. With a hurried him within, except in the presence of Ganay hand she signed her name, but she could himself. Nevertheless, before an hour had bear no more, and hastened from the passed, the whole news he had brought were chamber. known to Imbercourt, and were by him came to the Cours du Prince from that quar- with this coming ambassador will answer our The views of the young citizen in this desire to recall this most necessary paper. were certainly partly patriotic and partly project of an union between France and cast herself upon the bosom of her fair atten-Burgundy hopeless. Every fresh success of dant, and wept most bitterly. 'Fear not, the French king of course strengthened the madam,' whispered Alice, 'fear not! You arguments of those who advocated the mar-shall yet wed him you love.' riage of Mary with the Dauphin, and this torpower all opposition.

conceal it: each event, rather magnified than signed away my last and only chance! otherwise, reached the ears of Imbercourt, Mary herself. The news had reached Ghent not read the scheme of your future fate in the not long before, that almost the whole of the castle of Hannut?' Duchy of Burgundy also, had been overrun by French troops; and this, together with the her head and drying her eyes; 'what then, unresisted advance of the French king on the my Alice?' side of Flanders, the total loss of Picardy, her chancellor, as well as with her cousin, the brow of my fair mistress. Lord of Ravestein, and her best of friends,

ing her inheritance.

treat of her alliance with France, her feelings believe. overpowered her, and the tears gushing from her eyes, obscured her sight, confer with the messenger who had lately 'Give me the pen, my sweet child,' said arrived, and then held a long and secret con-Margaret of York. 'My Lord of Ravestein and myself, your two nearest relatives and The post that brought such unwelcome friends, will each write a part under your tidings from the frontier, supped well at the direction; so shall the document acquire Maison de Ville, and resting his weary limbs additional weight, as showing the wishes of

This was accordingly done, and Mary

'Poor child!' said Margaret of York. carried straight to the Princess. How it 'Poor child!-But now, my Lord of Imberreached him it were hard to say, for no post court, lose not a moment. No communication ter, but still he had learned it all. Not a purpose. You must see Louis himself; and word had escaped him,-the whole evil tid- treat with himself, and put forth all your ings were known, and the consternation was wisdom to meet all his cunning. Hasten to excited which Albert Maurice had been so Peronne; fear not to bloody your spurs on desirous of warding off, till the ambassador the road, for not a minute that flies, till you from France had been received and dismissed. are before the King of France, may not serve

While this determination was adopted by personal; but his immediate object was to the counsellors, Mary was followed from the send back the messenger of the deceitful room by Alice of Imbercourt, and the moment Louis with such a reply, as would render the she had reached her chamber, that Princess

Mary had never acknowledged her lingering rent of evil tidings was well calculated to over- hopes even to Alice of Imbercourt, perhaps hardly to her own heart. But now the more Such had been the light in which Albert vehement passion overcame the milder feeling, Maurice had seen the progress of Louis; but and timidity was forgotten in grief. 'Never, in vain, however, did he take measures to Alice! never!' sobbed Mary; 'I have just

'Fear not!' again repeated the young lady. and by him were that very night detailed to 'Do you remember, madam, when you would

'Well, very well!' replied Mary, raising

'Do you remember, then, that I stayed be-Artois, and the Boulonnois, the desertion of hind,' continued her companion, 'when you her friends, the turbulence of her subjects, and quitted my uncle's observatory? Well: I the power of her enemies, overcame at length remained long enough to give you consolation the unhappy girl's hopes and her firmness. even now; for I saw there written, that the After a long conference with Imbercourt and coronet of an archduchess was to bind the

Mary drew a deep and doubtful sigh; but Margaret, her father's widow, in an evil hour there was a bright blush rose also in her Mary consented to send the two former on a cheek, which might seem an augury of hope, mission to the base monarch who was usurp- and it were false to say that she did not derive some comfort even from the predic-Under their dictation, with a trembling tions of a science, which—since the excitehand, she wrote part of a letter to Louis XI.; ment of her visit to the castle of Hannut had but where she came to give them power to worn away-she could hardly be said to

> At that period, however, each day of the life of Mary of Burgundy was a day of re of the next morning opened with the tedious and with a haughty and contemptuous tone, and painful ceremony of receiving the ambassador from the French monarch.

At the hour appointed it was announced that the Count de Meulan waited, and Mary took her seat in state, with the Bishop of Liege on one hand and the Duke of Cleves on the other, while Albert Maurice and various members of the council stood round. It had struck the young citizen, however, as soon as he entered the hall of audience, that neither Imbercourt nor Hugonet, the two chief supporters of what was called the French party, were present. And it appeared to him not a little extraordinary that they should be absent, if in the town, when such an opportunity for showing their respect to the King of France occurred, as the public reception of of the ambassador, which that functionary During the time that elapsed in vain, for the absent counsellors, and on every movement near the door looked for their appearance, supposing that the business of the day could not or would not proceed without their presence. He was not a little surprised, however, when the order for admitting the Count de Meulan was at length given without their appearance.

The doors were soon thrown open; and, dressed in the excess of splendour, but with a certain crouching and stealthy pace, habitual to the barber of the most cunning king in Europe, Olivier le Dain entered the hall, and approached the chair of the Princess. After the ceremony of his introduction, which he went through, not without grace, but without dignity, the ambassador was commanded to deliver his letters, which he accordingly did. These were found to be in full and correct form, and he was then directed to state the purport of his embassy, and what he was charged to communicate to the Princess of Burgundy, from her cousin the King of

Here, however, the envoy hesitated; and, after a moment's thought, replied in a low soft voice, that he was directed by his master, Louis the most Christian king, to explain his views and wishes to his beloved cousin and the people of Ghent to invite the King of goddaughter, the Princess Mary, in private, France to enter their territory. He is further and to her alone. He therefore, he said, ordered to spare no means, neither money person who spoke on the part of the Princess. Ghent; for, though they may be anxious to He of course had evinced every sort of respect preserve their own liberties and privileges, for the ambassador of the French King; but they are no less anxious to preserve the legiti-newed care and anxiety; and the proceedings at this point the Duke of Cleves broke in; informed the Count de Meulan, that what he demanded was not consistent with the customs of the court of Burgundy. He must, therefore, he said, declare openly his errand to the Princess surrounded by her council, for no other proceeding could be permitted.

Again the ambassador hesitated: uttering several sentences, from which-though loaded with fine and sounding words, and gilded with a show of argument-all that could be gathered was, that the open communication required by the council was contrary to his monarch's commands. He then seemed about to retire; but at that moment Albert Maurice advanced a little before the rest, and craved leave to explain the object and views seemed to have so much difficulty in doing between his own arrival and the announcement for himself. The assembled court, and the of the ambassador, he asked frequently, but ambassador himself, gazed on him with some surprise; but the young citizen proceeded.

'In the first place,' he said, 'your grace will be glad to hear who is the noble envoy whom that mighty monarch, Louis, King of France, thinks fit to send to the court of Burgundy-to the daughter of that great Prince who overthrew him in the field by valour and skill, and who foiled him in the cabinet by decision and boldness. Allow me, in the man who calls himself Count de Meulan, to introduce to your notice Olivier le Dain, or by some called Le Méchant, barber to the most Christian King, born at Thielt, and serving as a barber's boy at Saarvelt, near this city.'-A roar of laughter burst from the nobles of Burgundy; and Albert Maurice proceeded, waving his hand to the doorkeepers to prevent the barber from making his exit too rapidly. - 'Do not let the worthy ambassador depart till he has heard me explain the object of his coming. I hold here in my hand, by the favour of some unknown friend who sent these papers to me, a copy of the private instructions of the King of France to the Barber Ambassador, which direct him, strictly, to keep the Princess and the court of Burgundy engaged in long and tedious negotiations, while he strives in private to persuade craved a private audience, in which his com- nor promises, to make the good men of this munication should be more full and complete. city declare for the King of France, and The Bishop of Liege, -whose territories lay throw off the authority of their lawful sovetoo near the French frontier, and whose in- reign. To this, by your grace's permission, terests were too nearly connected with those I, as the only individual of the Burgher class of France to suffer him to feel any great per- in this presence, will take upon me to reply, sonal interest in the distinct rights of the that Louis, King of France, mistakes entirely House of Burgundy,-had hitherto been the the character and disposition of the men of mate authority of their sovereign; and, Before he arrived at that building, however, messenger of a friend and a relation, while her people, and to bribe her citizens to revolt. what is to be done with the caitiff who undertakes such a commission for such a man!

'Nail his ears to the door-post,' cried the Lord of Vere, an impetuous noble of North

Zealand.

well deserve.

of the person of the barber ambassador were by that organ. suggested by different members of the council, probably without any intention of carrying unpleasant salutations, in order to return as them into effect. They were not, however, fast as possible to his hotel, some shouts met without producing some impression, and that his ear, which seemed rapidly coming nearer, of no very agreeable nature, upon the mind and in a moment after he perceived half-a-of Olivier le Dain himself. That worthy per-dozen horsemen cantering easily down the sonage had listened to the speech of Albert street, with a number of men and boys run-Maurice in downcast silence. No flush be- ning by the sides of the horses, shouting trayed his agitation or shame, though his lip loudly, 'Long live the Duke of Gueldres! quivered a little, and at one time he took two long live the noble Duke of Gueldres I' The or three steps towards the door. But when horseman at their head was a powerful handhe heard the many unceremonious methods some man, of about fifty, with a coarse but of treatment proposed, he gradually crept bold expression of countenance, but still back till he was within a step of the entrance possessing that easy air of dignity and comof the chamber. His face was still turned mand, which is a part of the education of towards the council; and he still seemed princes. Some one, as the cavalcade aplistening attentively to the somewhat bitter proached, recognising the person of the French strictures which were passing upon his own con- ambassador by his splendid dress and gaudy duct; but he showed no inclination to retreat train, shouted out the name and various farther than was absolutely necessary to keep opposite occupations of Master Olivier le himself out of the reach of violent hands, so Dain; and the Duke of Gueldres, dashing that the doorkeepers were off their guard. on, drove his horse rudely against that of the As the Duke of Cleves spoke, the barber unfortunate barber, which reared with the paused and listened, gave a furtive glance stroke, and almost plunged him into the over his shoulder; and then, without any effort towards taking leave, he darted out of the presence at once, reached the court-yard, Duke, in the coarse and brutal tone which he mounted his horse, and galloped away to the usually employed, when he had no purpose inn where he had lodged, though they are never disposed to submit to he had begun to feel that his apprehensions of tyranny from their own princes, they are no any personal violence had probably been a less determined to resist all foreign domi- little too hasty; and a loud laugh, that he nation. Let him learn that he can neither remembered to have heard, as he quitted the buy us with his gold, nor fool us with his audience-hall, confirmed him ln that opinion. promises; and that his intrigues and offers The calm reflection of a few hours, during will be equally in vain with the men of Ghent. which he seemed totally forgotten by the It is for you, my lords, he continued, turn- whole town, refreshed his courage and reing to the members of the council present, animated his hopes; and, therefore, not to 'as older men, and more experienced in the abandon his purpose without another effort, ways of courts than myself, -it is for you to he ventured to ride out in the evening; but judge what course ought to be pursued to- the moment that he presented himself in the wards a man who comes as ambassador to a streets, he was greeted with so much mockery sovereign Prince; and, at the same time, and laughter, that he soon found the attempt undertakes to seduce the subjects of that would be vain. A full account of his birth Prince from their allegiance-who approaches and situation had been industriously circulated the presence of an oppressed Princess, from amongst the people during the day; and as the man who is robbing her of her territories nothing excites the hatred and contempt of and massacring her subjects, affecting in the populace more than to see a person sprung words and in style to negotiate with her as from amongst themselves, affecting the airs from amongst themselves, affecting the airs and splendour of a class above them, they his real errand is to excite treason amongst were all prepared to shower upon his head every sort of ridicule and abuse. No sooner -It is for you, my lords, I say, to judge did he appear in the streets, than this determination to insult and annoy him in every different way, began to manifest itself among the people. One held a pewter basin before his horse's head; another lifted up his rugged chin, and begged that his highness would 'Throw him into the river!' cried the shave him, just to keep his hand in; and a Duke of Cleves; 'such treatment does he third exclaimed, that he must not think to lead the people of Ghent by the nose, though Various such pleasant modes of disposing he might often have taken the King of France

> Just while he was turning away from these canal, near which they were riding.

'Ha, ha! Master Barber,' shouted the to answer which might require softer speech;

but there is plenty in the canal.'

The populace roared their applause, and, while Olivier le Dain, keeping his seat with difficulty, made the best of his way back to his inn, and thence for ever out of the gates of Ghent, the Duke of Gueldres rode on, nor stopped till he sprang from his horse at the house of Albert Maurice.

Representatives from all the different cities of that part of Belgium which was then under the dominion of Burgundy, had arrived in Ghent the day before; and at the moment that the Duke of Gueldres approached, the young President was in the act of despatching a deputation to Louis XI., then encamped at Arras. Albert Maurice, be it remarked, went not himself; but at the head of the deputation, on the part of Ghent, was the druggist Ganay.

The Duke of Gueldres found the street before the young citizen's house crowded with horses and horse boys; and the different chambers of the house itself filled with the attendants of the deputies and the officers of the city-messengers, visitors, soldiers, and spectators-displayed a spectacle more like the palace of a sovereign prince than the house of a simple merchant in a Flemish town.
'By my faith,' the Duke muttered, as he walked on amidst robes, and embroidery, and gold chains, and furred gowns, 'times have strangely changed with the good city of Ghent, since that cursed tyrant shut me up in his old stone rat-trap. Which is master Albert Maurice?' he then demanded of a merchant who was passing out; 'which is the grand bailli-which is the President of the Municipal Council?'

Yonder he stands at the head of the table,' replied the merchant, 'speaking with the deputies of Utrecht and Bruges.'

At that moment the eye of the young citizen fell upon the Duke of Gueldres; and-though he was unannounced, and Albert Maurice had never beheld him before—either from having heard his personal appearance described, or, from having seen some picture of him, the burgher at once recognised the prince, and advanced a step or two to meet him.

The Duke of Gueldres was surprised to behold so young a man chosen from amongst the jealous and factious citizens of Ghent to wield the chief authority of the city, to fill two of the most important offices, and / to influence so strongly the councils of all Flanders; but he was still more surprised to find that high and dignified tone in the merchant, which so well became his station. He had been prepared to see the President in possession of vast power, but he now perceived that his power was greatly derived from his superiority to his class, and he at once saw the necessity of suiting his demeanour-

'thou canst never shave without water, man, for the time at least-to, the man. With a degree of suavity which no one knew better how to assume, when it answered his purpose, than Adolphus Duke of Gueldres, that base and brutal prince, now, with his manner softened down to an appearance of mere generous frankness, thanked the young citizen for his liberation, and told him that he had good reason to know that the happy event was solely owing to his intervention.

Albert Maurice at once gracefully complimented the Duke on his enlargement, and disclaimed all title to gratitude for an act which, he said, emanated from the Princess herself. He had, he acknowledged, strongly advised her to the course she had pursued, when she had condescended to consult him upon the subject; but he assured the Duke that she had done so first, before he had ventured to propose such a proceeding.

'Well, well,' replied the Duke, 'I knew not that my fair cousin was so generous, but I will kiss her pretty cheek in token of my thanks, which, perhaps, she will think no unpleasant way of showing one's gratitude.'

The blood rushed up to the temples of the young citizen, but he made no reply, and merely bowed low. He then begged the Duke to excuse him for a few moments, while he concluded the business in which he had been engaged. The Prince replied, that he would detain him no longer; and Albert Maurice with cold and formal courtesy suffered him to depart-from that moment either a secret or an avowed enemy, As soon as he was gone, the young citizen took leave of the deputies, besought them to make all speed to meet the King, and directed them to beg him-without hastening on to plunge the two nations in long and inveterate war-to halt his armies, till such time as the States General could devise and propose to his Majesty some fair means of general pacification.

He then gave into the hands of Ganay a letter, fully authorising the deputation to treat, in the name of the Princess,-which instrument had been unwillingly wrung from Mary during the morning, notwithstanding the secret powers which she had so lately given to Imbercourt and Hugonet. To this Albert Maurice added a private injunction, to trace and discover all the movements of the two ministers, whose absence from the council of that day, he had remarked: and there was a sort of fierce and flashing eagerness in the eye of the young citizen as he spoke this in a low whisper, which the druggist marked with pleasure and expectation.*

* The proceedings of the municipal council of Ghent, even before the assembling of the States which it entirely commanded, were, in many instances, much more bold and tyrannical than any that it has seemed necessary to particularise here. Some authors assert that it forbade Mary to transact any public business without its sanction.

The result of this deputation to the crafty bulent and head-strong subjects. ritory, which he was striving to add to France. fusion. At the same time, he positively refused to Louis saw them depart with scorn and treat with them in their official capacity, and triumph; and, as proud of his successful villany induce the deputies-encouraged by his homely from him. and good-humoured manner-to press so strongly for a further explanation, as to afford him some excuse for the base treachery he meditated against their sovereign.

The deputies fell into the trap he laid; made use of every argument to induce him to negotiate with them upon the powers they had received from their several cities; and IT is wonderful, though common to a proverb,

Still, however, Louis refused; and at length, birds in song. as if worn out by importunity, he said, 'My Chancellor of Burgundy, who were both with a warm and promising beam. me at Peronne for many hours some nights ago, and are by this time back again in Ghent.'

expressed, in the first heat of their astonish- cities and states of Flanders and Brabant, proment, a very uncourtly doubt of the truth of ceed in state to visit the Princess Mary; and the King's statement; and Louis, affecting the approbation of the crowd-often dependto consider his honour impugned, committed ing not a little upon the splendour of the one of the basest acts of the many that stain several trains-was loudly expressed as their his memory, and produced the private letter peculiar favourites approached the gates of the monarch of France is so well known, that it with indignation and disappointment, the needs but short recapitulation. Louis re-deputies retired from the presence of the ceived the members of the Belgian states with King, without having concluded anything, all civility, and treated them individually with and journeyed on with all speed towards distinction; as that wily monarch well knew, Ghent, neglecting the great and vital busithat through the intervention of such men ness of the moment, in order to plunge foralone he could hope to win that extensive ter- ward into fresh scenes of anarchy and con-

affected, at first, a degree of mystery in re- as ever conqueror was of a final victory, he gard to his reasons, assigning a thousand marched on to new successes in every direc-vague and unreasonable motives for so doing, tion, satisfied that, in the discontented spirit which he well knew would not be believed of the people of Ghent, he had a faithful for a moment; but which he was aware would ally that not even self-interest could sever

CHAPTER XXVI.

ALICE GOES FOR AID.

finally urged, that if he would not acknow- that days of sunshiny brightness and placid ledge them as the representatives of the towns tranquillity should so often precede great conof Flanders, Hainault, and Brabant, he must vulsions in the natural and the political at least consent to receive them as ambassa- world; and that, although 'coming events dors from the young Duchess of Burgundy, do throw their shadows before them,' yet that whose letters of authority they then ten- the storm, when it does come, should almost always find the world all smiling, and the

The day after the return of the deputation good friends of Ghent and the other towns from Arras, the aspect of the city of Ghent of Flanders, you must very well know, from was more like that which it had been during my whole conduct towards you, that I would the most brilliant days of Philippe the Good rather treat with you than with any other and Charles the Bold than it had appeared for persons. I am a plain man, and love to deal many months. The shops and booths which with plain citizens, but you are entirely mis-taken in supposing that you possess the con-totally unprovided with any means of defence fidence of my dear god-child Mary, Duchess against popular violence, were generally closed of Burgundy, or that you are really author- in times of tumult and disturbance, were now ised to treat for her. It is not impossible, he again all open, and full of their finest wares. added, with a self-satisfied and yet mysterious Mountebanks of different grades, and those air, 'it is not at all impossible, that were I who sold books, and repeated verses, were ten partly in her own hand, partly in that of of the streets. Burghers and their wives, the Duchess Dowager, and partly in that of the lords and ladies, artisans and peasantry, all good Lord of Ravestein, directing me to place in their gayest dresses, -for it was one of the confidence in no persons but my excellent, high festivals of the year,-moved about in good friends, and faithful servants, the Lord the streets; and, to crown all, the foul weather of Imbercourt, and William de Hugonet, had disappeared, and the sun shone out with

A great multitude had collected near the palace gates, to see the different members of The deputies, confounded and surprised, the council, and the deputies from the various of the Princess Mary to the eyes of her tur- great court. At the same time it was remarkapplause, the multitude restrained all marks degree command. of disapprobation on the appearance of per- there contrary to her commands, she strove to ful and unexpected moderation.

Since the first effervescence of feeling had words died away before they were uttered, subsided, after the defeat of Nancy, and the and the smile faded upon her lip as soon as it death of Charles the Bold, and since the apprehension of immediate revolt had gone by, the ministers of Mary of Burgundy, -or, to speak more correctly, the members of the provincial council of Flanders-though spending the greater part of the day in the palace, had generally returned to inhabit their own hotels at night. Thus, almost every one but the Lord of Ravestein, who remained in the palace with his cousin, had to traverse the crowd in their way to the audience-hall. Imbercourt and Hugonet, neither of whom had ever been very popular, passed amidst opposed to her own opinion, or to her dearest profound silence; and Maillotin du Bac, who, wishes. On Albert Maurice, too, as the in his official dress as Prévôt, was riding about the ground, took no small credit to himself for saving those two noblemen from some sort of insult. The Duke of Cleves, again, was loudly cheered; but the Duke of Gueldres, who, by some means unknown even to himself, had none who beheld the young citizen in the acquired an extraordinary degree of popularity during the short time which had elapsed since his return to the city, received a degree pearance at least, to take his place among the of applause that far outdid that which greeted noblest and most courtly of the land. His the Duke of Cleves. Albert Maurice, however, as the great favourite of the people, and the easy grace of confident but not presuming one whom they considered more peculiarly as self-possession. There was also a freshness fiery horse, dressed in magnificent apparel,not only as president of the council of Ghent and pleasing.

business of importance was to be transacted, taken possession of a station which was his the Princess received her court in state; and, to see the splendour with which she was sur- nature. The respect and deference also with rounded, the guards, the attendants, the which all the rest of the court felt themselves kneeling subjects, no one would have sup- obliged to treat him, both from his authority posed that Mary of Burgundy was less a free over the people, and the powers of his own agent than the meanest subject in her capital.

All who presented themselves before the Princess were received with affability and courtesy, with the one exception of the Duke of Gueldres, from whom, as he approached the chair of state, she seemed to shrink with a

* When the States of Flanders assembled in Ghent, which was generally the case, either the chief pensionary or the chief eschevin of that city presided in the assembly as a matter of right.

able that, though loud and vociferous in their repulsive abhorrence, which she could in no Although he appeared sons supposed to be unpopular, with wonder- say something kind in regard to his liberation, and to smile as he offered his thanks; but the appeared. To Imbercourt and Hugonet, the Lord of Vere, and others, who supported the French alliance-although they had so strongly pressed her to sacrifice all her own personal feelings, and to abandon the hope of happiness for life-she still, from a deep conviction of the honesty of their intentions, and from long habits of regard, yielded the same marks of friendship and affection with which she had always distinguished the counsellors and friends of her father, however much their advice to him or to herself had been at times boldest and strongest supporter of her own wishes against the voice of her more politic advisers, and as the leader of those who really ruled in Flanders, she smiled sweetly, from a feeling of gratitude as well as esteem; and midst of that splendid court, could help acknowledging that he was well fitted, in apmien had all the calm dignity of power and their own representative, was received with and variety in his words and actions, which, loud, long-continued, and reiterated shouts. springing from a rich and generous mind, gave Indeed, as he rode on upon a splendid and a sparkling grace to the whole of his demeanour, and rendered it at once striking There was certainly a differand grand bailli of the city, but as holding, in ence in his manners from that of the stiff and the capacity of chief pensionary, the presi- stately nobles of the court of Burgundy, but it dency of the States General of Flanders,* and was slight, and to his advantage, characterised followed as such by a number of guards and by no want of grace or dignity, but rather by attendants—with his lordly air and his beau- the calm ease of natural politeness, as opposed tiful person, he looked more like some mighty to the acquired formality of courtly etiquette. prince going to claim his bride, that a simple It seemed, not that he was assuming a rank, merchant about to appear before his sovereign. and mingling amidst a class to which he did The visit was one of ceremony, and as no not belong, but rather as if he had suddenly own by the indefeasible right of ennobling mind, placed him more at his ease; and perhaps the very excitement which he felt under the eyes of Mary of Burgundy, and the mighty aspirations and brilliant hopes which thrilled in his bosom, were not without their share in giving firmness and dignity to the step with which he trode the ducal halls of the house of

Thus passed by the morning; and everything proceeded in undisturbed harmony and tranquillity, both within the court and it is walls. The populace showed themselves calm and placable; and it had heaven to bear up against everything. It know not well how it is, your Grace, seldom happened of late that so many nobles and statesmen, of different opinions and dif-replied Alice, with a sigh; nothing par-ferent interests, had met within the gates of ticular has happened to make me so; and that palace with so little jarring and con-tention. Nevertheless, there were things ob-served by many of the keen eyes which hang 'Nay, Alice,' replied the Princess, 'you tention. Nevertheless, there which hang served by many of the keen eyes which hang about courts, and watch the flickering signs of the times, that boded events not quite so gundy, "your Grace," when from our earliest the first expect of offeirs wears we have grown up together as sisters in his eye, which spoke no very cordial feeling yet be good.' towards that nobleman. Imbercourt himself, whose demeanour through life had always plied Alice; and in that book, -which I been characterised by calm gravity, which, wish I had never looked into,—in the cabinet without absolutely approaching to sadness, at Hannut, I saw that some time soon, you had been still farther removed from cheerfulness, had-since the death of his master- if I shall be one. shown himself more gloomy and reserved than met the fiery glance of the young citizen, Margaret, who inhabited the other wing of however, calm and unchanged. His eyelid the building.

Alice willingly followed; and the Duchess lip remained unmoved. Not a trace of emo-tion of any kind passed over his face, as he endured rather than returned the gaze of the young citizen; and, after remaining a few minutes in the Princess's presence, he took his leave, mounted his horse, and rode home-Margaret's mind was of that firm and equable, wards. But as he passed by Maillotin du though gentle tone, which feels every mis-Bac, and addressed some common observation fortune intensely, but bears it with unshaken to that officer, there was a sort of triumphant resolution; and it is a quality of such minds sneer on the hard countenance of the Prévôt, and an unnatural degree of courtesy in his and enduring power to others with whom manner, from which those who saw it inferred they are brought in contact. Thus Mary of no very favourable anticipations in his mind Burgundy always felt more calm and more regarding the Lord of Imbercourt.

Mary of Burgundy was left alone with Alice instance, her design in visiting her stepmother of Imbercourt, and a few of her other attend- was to derive some such support, she was not ants, her heart seemed lightened of a load, disappointed. Both herself and Alice of Imand a smile, which approached the expression bercourt returned from the apartments of the the first time since her father's death.

over. I was very anxious about the passing especially as nothing occurred during the rest by of this morning, for I feared much that of the morning to recall them to the mind some angry clashing might have taken place, of either the Princess or her fair attendant. concerning the messengers despatched to the The day went by in peace and tranquillity.

tranquillity, both within the Cours du Prince of her father; you are sad, Alice, you, pacific and gentle as the first aspect of affairs years we have grown up together as sisters might augur. Between Albert Maurice and more than friends. But be not gloomy, dear the Lord of Imbercourt no words passed; and Alice; all will, I trust, go well. There is not as their glances encountered upon more than that evil, in all this sorrowful world, which one occasion, the lordly brow of the young could shake my trust in an over-ruling Provicitizen became overcast, and a fire blazed up dence, or make me doubt that the end will

'But sorrows must sometimes happen,' rewere to lose two faithful friends :- I wonder

'Heaven forbid! dear Alice,' replied the he had ever before appeared; and, on the Princess. 'However, I am sorry that you present occasion, also, there was a deep, im- have told me; and she fell into a deep and movable sternness in his countenance, which somewhat painful teverie, from which she had something in it more profound than can only roused herself, to propose that they be expressed by the word melancholy. He should go and visit the Dowager Duchess,

Alice willingly followed; and the Duchess -though, in her grief and widowhood, she had taken no part in the ceremonies of the day-received her fair visitors with gladness, and inquired with some anxiety how the morning and its events had passed away. to communicate a part of their own tranquil garding the Lord of Imbercourt.

resigned after conversing long with Margaret
When the whole ceremony was over, and of York than before; and if, in the present of happiness, brightened her countenance for Duchess less gloomy than when they went; and the vague omens which had given rise to 'Thank God, Alice,' she said, 'that it is their melancholy were dropped and forgotten, concerning the messengers despatched to the true day went by in peace and tranquinty, cruel King of France.—But you are sad, The multitudes dispersed and retired to their Alice, she continued,—seeing the fair face of own homes. The brief sunshine of a winter's her gay friend overcast with unusual clouds, which probably had arisen from the increased and a thick white fog, rolling densely up from gloom she had observed upon the countenance the many rivers and canals that intersect the obscure. Several of the hours of darkness herself of utterance. also went by in tranquillity: though the glare of many torches, lighting various groups of is the matter, my sweet girl? demanded persons, through the dim and vapoury atmo- Mary, anxiously. Speak, speak, dear Alice! sphere, and casting round them a red and what has happened so to affect you?' misty halo of circumscribed light, together with the shouting voices of people who had father-my dear father!' lost their way, and the equally loud replies of those who strove to set them right, broke deadly pale. "What has happened to him, occasionally upon the still quiet of the streets of Ghent, during the course of the evening. mind to that mysterious state of unconscious apathy, which seems given to show that we live again, after a brief pause of mental extinction. Mary of Burgundy, whose days— if ever the days of mortal being did so should have passed in peace, was about to retire to rest, thanking Heaven that one more scene in life's long tragedy was over. Her fair hair was cast over her shoulders, in soft and silky waves, and she was thinking-with the natural comment of sorrow upon human life—' how sweet a thing is repose!' Although come. she had assumed in public the state of a sovereign Princess, in private she had hitherto dispensed with that burdensome etiquette, which renders the domestic hours of princes little less tedious than their public ceremonies. Her ladies were all dismissed to rest before she herself retired to her own apartment, and two tiring women of inferior rank were all that remained to aid her preparation for were composed of the thoughts of dress and ornament, contented themselves with performing their several offices about the person of the Princess, and leaving her mind to But of whom reflection. Thus, perhaps, the hour which she manded Mary. spent each night in her own chamber, ere she lay down to rest, was one of the sweetest portions of time to Mary of Burgundy: It was the hour in which her heart, relieved mune with itself at ease; and, could one have night, the whole course of her life gives reason to believe, that they would have displayed as fine and pure a tissue of sweet and from him, if anything happened, in the tumult noble ideas, as ever the mind of woman wove. of this city, to cause me danger or distress. Her toilet for the night, however, had pro- He said that the Vert Gallant owed him much. ceeded but a short way, on the present Let me go, madam, I beseech you. occasion, when the door of the chamber was 'But you cannot go alone, dear Alice of Imbercourt, pale, agitated, tremmuch bewildered as she was herself; 'you bling, with her own brown hair streaming cannot go alone, and at this hour of the night. over her shoulders like that of the Princess; At all events, you must have a party of the and showing how sudden had been the news guards. that so affected her, rushed into the apartment, and, casting herself upon her knees let one person pass through the gates at a before Mary, hid her eyes upon the lap of the time; and there are men here set to watch town of Ghent, rendered all the streets doubly Princess, and wept so bitterly as to deprive

'What is the matter, my dear Alice? What

'Oh, madam, madam!' sobbed Alice, 'my

'What of him?' exclaimed Mary, turning

Alice; tell me, I beseech you?

Oh, madam, they have arrested him and All this, too, passed away, and the hour the Lord of Hugonet!' replied Alice, 'and approached for resigning the body and the have dragged them from their beds, loaded with chains, to the town-prison!'

'Good God!' cried Mary, clasping her can die, as far as sentient being goes, and yet hands; will they deprive me of all my friends? Has not the gold of Louis tempted all feeble hearts from my service, and will my own subjects take from me the only ones who have been found firm?'

'They will kill them,—depend upon it, they will kill them!' cried Alice. 'There is only one person on the earth can save them; and, alas! I fear that these butchers of Ghent will be too quick in their murder for him to

'Who do you mean, dear girl?' cried Mary. Who is there you think can aid them? What do you propose? Let us lose no time; but take any way to save their lives. Some one, she added, turning to her tiring women, 'go to my mother, the Duchess; tell her I would fain speak with her.-Now, Alice, what way do you propose?'

'Oh, let me go l' cried Alice, wildly, 'let repose. Those women, whose whole intellects me go! Let me lose not a moment of time! I will easily find him out, or send on messengers, or bring him by some way! Let me go, I beg-I intreat!'

'But of whom do you speak?' again de-'You forget, dear Alice, I know not what you mean.'

'I mean,' replied Alice, while a slight blush passed rapidly over her countenance, and was immediately again succeeded by the from all the pressure of the day, could comeager and terrified paleness which had before mune with itself at ease; and, could one have appeared there,—'I mean—I mean the Vert looked into her thoughts on that or any other Gallant of Hannut. 'Tis scarce three days ago, that, by a letter from Hannut, Hugh de Mortmar bade me seek aid and assistance

'But you cannot go alone, dear Alice,' rethrown open with unceremonious haste, and plied the Princess, gazing upon her almost as

'Oh, no, no, cried Alice; 'they will only pass.

Burgundy entered the chamber of her step- President; I will speak with him myself. been able to gather them from her terrified my faithful servants. companion, when she found that Margaret ticulars concerning the arrest of Imbercourt thank you for your comfort! But I must go, and Hugonet than even herself. So daring she added, with eager anxiety; 'I must not an act on the part of the turbulent men of lose a moment. Ghent, as the arrest of two members of the But their personal apprehensions for the determine on some better plans than your own future, and consideration of the long series unassisted fancy can frame.' of calamities and horrors which such a deed portended, were overpowered by the the minute details of all that ensued; and, victims of popular sedition. The tears poured concluded, that many words would only serve over her cheeks, her fair hands clasped in to give a false impression of things that were convulsive agony, till the taper fingers seemed resolved and executed in a few brief moments. as if they would have broken; and still she Suffice it, then, that the page was soon besought the Princess, with wild eagerness, to permit her instant departure in search of in eager and hasty consultation, it was dehim on whose assistance she seemed to place termined that he should proceed in search of her only hope of delivering her father.

her reasonings with Alice, for the purpose of enable Alice to make her escape with less persuading her to take some protection and chance of observation than if she attempted assistance, at least, with her in her attempt to escape from the town, and in the difficult foot, at that hour of the night. search she proposed for one, whose character was so doubtful, and whose dwelling was so uncertain. But Margaret, animated by a bolder spirit, saw the proposal in a different light, and supported strongly the desire of endeavouring to discover some boatman, who Alice, to seek the assistance she hoped for, accompanied alone by the page.

'Great things,' she said, 'have been done by less men than this adventurer seems to be. has been won by the aid of foresters and outlaws. If you can once secure his assistance, and he can, by any of those strange means which he has been often known to employ so more. successfully, introduce his bands within the town, these rebellious men of Ghent may yet be taught a lesson which they have much need to learn. Go then, my poor girl, if you have found it difficult to wake the boatman out of any, even probable means of discovering the his first sleep, the boy was so long in returnabode of him you seek. Take the page with ing, that all Alice's preparations for her you; furnish yourself with all the money and journey were completed, and many minutes jewels which you can collect. The Princess spent in agonising anxiety, ere he re-appeared. and I will do our best to contribute, for with When he did come, however, he brought the such men gold is better than eloquence; and, glad tidings that all was ready, and, after at all events, you will have the satisfaction of taking leave of the Princess, with a rapid but doing your duty towards your father.

.... pp

the river, so that no large boat can parations must take long, and I will leave no means unused to delay their proceedings, and At this moment the Dowager Duchess of to mitigate their rancour. I will send for the daughter; and Mary was beginning to ex- will intreat, I will beseech, I will rather lay plain the circumstances, as far as she had down my own life than that they should hurt

'Thank you! thank you, dear lady!' rewas already acquainted with many more par- plied Alice, kissing her hand; 'thank you,

'Stay, stay!' said the young Duchess, seeing supreme council of Flanders, of course terrified her about to depart. 'Let Bertha call the and shocked both Mary and her stepmother. page whom we employed before, and we will

It would be unnecessary here to enter into wild agony of the daughter of one of those indeed, so rapidly were the arrangements brought to the presence of the Princess; and, a small skiff, which, being brought opposite Mary called upon her stepmother to second to the palace wall, on the water side, would to pass the gates either on horseback or on

No large boat would be allowed to pass, and therefore he was directed to seek the smallest that he could possibly find; but, at the same time, to use all his shrewdness in was either trustworthy by native honesty, or might be rendered secret by a bribe. The boy at once declared in reply, that he well knew a man who used to bring the Duke's Many a battle between York and Lancaster venison up from the woods, and whose taciturnity was so great that those who knew him averred that he had never said ten words to anybody yet, nor ever would say ten words

In search of this very desirable person the page instantly proceeded; but, either from the darkness of the night, or from having silent step, Alice threaded the dark and intri-'In the meantime, Alice,' added Mary, cate passages of the palace, passed the postern be not more anxious than you can help for unquestioned, and finding her way with diffi-your father's safety. These men will, doubters, never attempt anything against his life steps which led towards the water, she found without the steps which led towards the water, she found without bringing him to trial. All the pre- herself at last by the side of the boat. Stepping forward over some unsteady planks, she boat skimmed swiftly along the waters, and was speedily seated in the stern, with the boy ere long the last bridge was past. Beyond beside her: the single boatman, whom they it there extended along the banks a short had found waiting, pushed silently away from suburb, terminated by scattered houses be-the bank, and, in a minute after, the skiff was longing to cowfeeders and gardeners, and making its slow way through the fog, down forming a sort of brief connecting link bethe dull current of the Scheldt.

CHAPTER XXVII.

ALICE READS THE SECRET.

ALTHOUGH other matters of some moment might claim attention in this place, we will not interrupt the course of our narrative, but will follow on, throughout her journey, the fair fugitive from the city of Ghent; as far, at least, as that journey was permitted to proceed uninterrupted.

bosom of the Scheldt, with hardly any noise, except the occasional dip of the oar in the water, and the slight creaking of the gunnel as the rower plied his stroke. As every one knows, the river which, a little distance further down its stream, assumes so much as the sturdy boatman impelled them on, unimportance as to be the object of intrigue, negotiation, and even war to rival nations, presents no very imposing aspect in the neigh-bourhood of Ghent; but so gloomy was the moonless sky, and so dense was the heavy fog that hung over the waters, that from the moment the boat had pushed off from the quay, both banks became quite invisible. The deep, misty obscurity of the atmosphere, and the profound darkness of the night, might have been a cause of terror to Alice of Imbercourt under any other circumstances; but of light, and the difficulties of the navigation, were swallowed up in the fear of being overtaken or impeded in her escape, and the impenetrable veil which seemed to cover all things around her she looked upon as a blessing, in the hope that it would also conceal ing lines of the uplands which in other direcherself. The darkness, however, which gave this feeling of security did not continue so uninterrupted as to leave her entirely without alarm. Now and then, as the boat shot past some of the warehouses, or the quays, where the larger craft were moored, an indistinct dim line of light would break across the mist from lamp or lantern, hung up to show the late watcher the objects of his toil or of his anxiety; and the heart of poor Alice would beat quick with fear, lest the skiff, or any widening course of the Scheldt as flowing on, of those it contained, should attract the eye of reflecting, here and there, the faint lines of the eager and wary citizens. But all this was light which it caught from the sky, and which soon past; the boatman rowed strongly and served to mark its track, till it was lost in the well; the slow current with which they were sombre shadows of the trees. An indefinite proceeding was not powerful enough to afford feeling of dread passed through the bosom of much assistance to his exertions, but still the Alice of Impercourt as the boat cut its way

tween the wide open country and the fortified city; and further on, again, came the rich fields and meadows in the immediate vicinity of the town, blending gradually into the thick woods that at that time commenced about Heusden and Melle.

Alice's heart beat more freely, as the fresher air, the slight clearing away of the mist, the occasional lowing of the cattle, and that in-describable feeling of expanse which is only known in the country, showed her—though she could not yet see the objects on the banks -that she had passed beyond the limits of the city of Ghent. The page, too, felt the same relief, and for the first time ventured a The boat glided along over the calm dull whispered observation on the good fortune that had attended their movements. Alice was still too fearful of being pursued or discovered, to make any reply, but by commanding him to silence; and no further sound marked their course but the stroke of the oars, wearied, over the waters of the Scheldt.

At the distance of about three miles from the city the air became gradually less dense, and at the end of half a mile more the fog had cleared away entirely. It was still dark, but the stars afforded sufficient light to show the fair fugitive, and her companion, that they were passing through a country where the meadow and the cornfield were gradually merging into the forest. Scattered patches of copse and underwood, mingled with fields which had been reclaimed to the use of man, now all apprehensions of danger from the want came sweeping down to the banks of the river, and straight before the travellers lay a dark and shadowy track, broken into dense, heavy masses, the rounded forms of which, cutting black upon the lighter sky beyond, distinguished it as wood, from the soft sweeptions marked the horizon.

There is scarcely anything on earth more gloomy and impressive than the aspect of a deep wood by night, with just sufficient light in the sky to contrast strongly with the stern body of impenetrable shade presented by the forest, and yet not enough to show any of the smaller parts into which it appears separated by day. The wood lay straight before the bow of the boat, seeming to swallow up the

which the forest seemed to present at that boatman, in a tone rough but not uncivil. hour of the night. She believed, indeed, that she had no cause for fear; and her own What news from Ghent? How goes the good peculiar plans absolutely required that she should banish all timidity of the kind that she now felt. Some inquiry, however, was necessary, in order to guide her further movements; and, as her apprehensions of pursuit had by this time vanished, she addressed a few words to the boatman, to lead him into conversation regarding the part of the country at which they had now arrived.

'Those seem very dark and extensive bods,' she said; 'do we pass through woods, them?

'Yes, noble lady,' replied the man, and struck on with more vigour than before, as if he considered the time occupied by the three words he spoke as lost to all profitable employment,

'Are they safe to travel at night?' demanded the young lady again.

'No, noble lady,' was all the reply she received.

But do you mean that it is dangerous to pass through them in a boat?' said Alice.

'I cannot tell, madam,' replied the man; but still he rowed on, and the page-laughing with the thoughtless glee of youth-whispered that the attempt was vain to make silent Martin give them any information, as he had never been known to speak ten words to an end in his life. By this time they were within the limits of the forest, and nothing surrounded them on every side but the trees dip- himself, with a certain degree of awkward ping down their branches over the water. Alice, however, ventured one more question, to which the answer she received, though as short, was more satisfactory than those the boatman had formerly given.

'How far does the wood extend?' she demanded.

'Three quarters of a league, noble lady,' replied the boatman, and again plied his oar

Whether Alice's voice, and his reply, had called attention, or whether the stroke of the oars itself could be heard at the banks, cannot be determined; but he had scarcely anwhich an old oak had planted itself, spreading its roots down to the very river. Then came a rushing sound, as of something im- landing, seemed to reassure the fair traveller, by the regular sound of oars, and, in a mo- most other people at such a moment. ment after, a boat, rowed by two strong men, darted out into the mid-stream, and followed rapidly after that in which Alice sat. Still silent Martin, as the boy called him, rowed brought them up alongside the boat, and, often found by those who seek him not. Ho, on towards the dark and gloomy wilderness grappling her tight, they addressed the city?

'So ho, friend!' they cried, 'stop a bit.

Well, well, my masters,' replied the boatman, still striving to impel his skiff forward, though the proximity of the other boat rendered the effort to use his oars unavailing.

'It is silent Martin,' said one of the men, 'and a fair dame, by the Lord. Who have you here, Master Martin?'

'There, there!' replied the boatman, with what appeared to be an immense effort to make an oration; 'there, there! let me get You do not stop women, my masters. Surely you would never stop a lady like that?' And, exhausted with this long speech, he again tried to push away from the other boat, but in vain.

'No, no,' cried one of the men, 'we will not stop the lady long; but every one who rows along the Scheldt, now-a-days, must have a pass from the Captain. So come along, Master Martin; and when you and the young lady have given all the news of Ghent, that, doubtless, you can give, -for certainly young ladies do not come up the Scheldt at this hour of the night for nothing,-we will let you go on your way.'

'Fine times!' said silent Martin: but, as resistance was in vain, he suffered them to pilot his boat to the mouth of the little creek from which their own had shot out; and he gentleness, aided Alice of Imbercourt to land.

Her feelings were of a very mixed nature; but, assuredly, not such as might be imagined from a consideration of the more obvious circumstances of her situation. She was certainly terrified as well as agitated, and she trembled a good deal; but, at the same time, she showed no unwillingness to obey the commands of those who now had her in their Her terror, however, did not escape power. the eyes of the men who had rowed the other boat; and one of them addressed her in a kindly tone, saying, 'Fear not, lady, fear not. No lady ever suffered harm or dishonour from swered, when a slight plash was heard from the Green Riders of Hannut. So fear not, behind a little projection of the shore, on and you shall soon be free to go whithersoever you will.

These words, which he spoke as they were pelled quickly through the water, succeeded more than they would, probably, have done

'Oh, where is he?' she exclaimed eagerly. 'Lead me to him, I beseech you. It is he whom I am now seeking.'

'Ay, indeed !' said the adventurer. 'Mean stoutly on without a word; but the superior you the Vert Gallant of Hannut, lady? He is power of the two men who pursued soon soon found by those who seek him, and rather least to help you up the bank.'

her foot the next.

more open ground, where her guide hurried more important business in their near neighbis pace, and Alice was obliged to follow bourhood. rapidly upon his steps, though not without sheltered arena whence it was diffused.

some time broken up, and the preceding day sleek, round monk, of whom we have pre-had been warm and fine. Nevertheless, suffi-cient precautions had been taken by the tenants of the forest to dispel, in their own pen, seemed tracing some despatch at the neighbourhood, at least, whatever touch re-dictation of the adventurous leader. mained of winter. In the midst of the open

Roger!' he continued, addressing his com- space which Alice now entered, they had piled panion in the boat, rouse up Frank Von up, with very unceremonions appropriation of Halle, and Simpkin yonder, to keep watch the Duke's forest trees, a fire of immense logs, with thee, while I lead the lady and the boy sufficient to roast a hecatomb; and many a to the rendezvous. Come now, my pretty relic of the more ancient and simple methods mistress, 'he added, 'take care of your steps, of dressing meat displayed themselves around, for it is as dark as the tomb. Here, take an in various immense pieces of venison and beef old man's arm. It was more pliant in days roasting on wooden spits in the open air, while of yore, but never stronger, and will serve at a gigantic black cauldron, pendant from the immemorial triple chevron, which has sus-Alice was glad of assistance, and laid her pended all primeval pots from the days of hand on his shoulder; but though his occu- Noah, fumed and bubbled with most savoury pation had been sufficiently evident before, promise. Around, in groups, lay a number of yet she almost started back when her fingers stout soldiery, prepared to refresh their vigorrested upon plates of cold iron, forming the ous and sinewy limbs with the contents of the brassards or defensive armour for the arms— pot, or the burden of the spit, as soon as those so much are our minds the slaves of our cor-skilled in the mystery of cooking pronounced poreal sensations, that our convictions are that they were ready for the knife. Several never vivid till we have verified them by our more, whose appetite seemed still fiercer, stood external senses. She recovered herself imround the fire, watching with anticipating exmediately, however, and held by his arm both pectation the progress of the cookery. But for support and direction; for the whole scene it is to be remarked, at the same time, that around was wrapped in profound obscurity; amongst all this number of persons—amount-and though her eye was already accustomed ing tully to fifty or sixty—a great deal of to the night, yet the additional gloom of the decent order was kept up, and nothing like forest was so great, that she followed the adeeither rioting or confusion was observed, notventurer in perfect blindness, without being withstanding the more than doubtful character able to see one moment where she was to set of the persons concerned. There was no sing-After climbing a slight acclivity, which versing together spoke in an undertone, as compelled them to walk slowly, they came to if afraid of disturbing some person engaged in

The cause of this orderly tranquillity, peroften shrinking back for fear of striking against haps, might be seen by running the eye on a the trees, which her imagination pictured as little way beyond the fire, where stood a sort protruding across the path. The way, though, of rude, but extensive, wooden shed or hut, in fact, short, of course seemed to her long, raised upon a number of upright piles driven from the darkness and uncertainty in which she into the ground, and thatched on the top with moved: but at length a light began to glisten boughs, and leaves, and rushes, which matethrough the trees; and, after walking on a rials also served to cover three sides of the few minutes longer, she perceived a glare as building. The side that remained open was strong as almost to make her believe that a turned towards the fire, and, consequently, part of the wood was on fire. As her conductor advanced, she every now and then caught took place in that direction, and exposed to a glimpse, through the breaks in the wood, of the sight of the other parties in the savanna figures moving about across the light towards all that was passing in the interior of the hut. which they were approaching; but a moment It was owing to this disposition that, as Alice after, the whole scene was again shut out, by approached, she at once perceived the Vert a tract of withered beech trees, loaded with Gallant of Hannut habited, as we have before their thick dry leaves, through which the path described him, reclining on the ground under that Alice and her guide were pursuing, took the shed, with a paper before him, on which a sudden turn. The glare of the fire, how- was apparently traced a rude map of some ever, was sufficiently general to light them country, the topography of which he seemed easily on their way; and in a few minutes studying intently. Sitting beside him,—supmore they emerged at once into the little plied with a flat board, which served the pureltered arena whence it was diffused.

The frost, as I have before said, had for implements for writing,—was the figure of the

On the other side of the Vert Gallant stood a page, -whose rich dress of green and gold from its present tenants; and in the chamber his hand, to throw light upon the papers before his two companions; and near him of some distinction, whose horse, all in flakes page close by the entrance of the shed.

The approach of Alice and her conductor persons assembled in the savanna upon her; and, shrinking from the gaze of the rude men the Vert Gallant once more stood before her. amongst whom she now found herself, she drew her mantle closer round her, and bent her look upon the ground, while, at the desire of him who had led her thither, she paused the groups around, he walked forward at once to the shed; and only staying till the Vert hung upon his lips, he addressed a few words event of a sad and serious nature has gained to him, which were inaudible where Alice me the honour of your presence in this wild stood. Their effect upon the leader was great place.' and instantaneous. He started at once upon the casque, which he seemed never to lay aside, still prevented his own countenance think that I do not know you? from being seen.

ever, he advanced at once to Alice; and, bending respectfully over her hand which he took in his, he bade her welcome with kind but respectful courtesy.

'I know the general meaning of your coming, lady,' he said, 'though not the immediate cause; and I will speak with you as soon as I have despatched you messenger. In the mean-doubt; though why Hugh de Mortmar should time trust to this old man, my lieutenant, who need to league with outlaws and adventurers, commands in private.

Alice listened attentively, and looked up when he had done, with a glance, in which anxiety and apprehension for her father's fate were strangely mingled-considering the lant followers, replied the young cavalier, moment and the scene-with a rise of the eye- undoing the clasps of his casque. brow, and a turn of the fair mouth, which to guard against surprise or inadvertency, to altogether approached very near one of the wear so foul a seeming as this, even beneath merry smiles that had so thronged her lips that heavy helmet; and removing the iron in happier days. She replied not, however, cap, he showed her a half mask representing though at first she appeared about to do so; the countenance of a negro, which covered his but following her former conductor in silence, was led once more into the paths of the wood. She was not now called upon to walk far, for somewhat aghast! Is it at that fearful painted little more than a hundred steps brought her in f.ont of a low-roofed building, which in former times had been apparently the abode think that you -you, De Mortmar-should, of one of the forest guards, but which had for any cause, condescend to hide yourself evidently fallen into the occupation of the free behind such a semblance. companions.

seemed but ill to correspond with the scene in to which Alice was conducted, nothing apwhich he was found, -holding a torch high in peared to announce that it was not still the abode of quiet and affluent industry.

The moment she and the page had entered, again was a person in the habit of a courier the old man retired and closed the door; and Alice remained gazing upon the embers of the of foam with hard riding, stood held by another wood fire that lay sparkling on the hearth, till the sound of rapid steps passing the window again made her heart beat with redoubled instantly drew the eyes of a great part of the quickness. In a moment after the door was thrown open, and the tall, graceful figure of

> 'Quit the room, sir page,' he said as he entered, 'but do not leave the chamber door.

The boy hesitated, but a sign from Alice with the page, and suffered their guide to ad- made him instantly obey; and the Vert Galvance alone. Without taking any notice of lant advancing, took her hand and led her to a seat.

'You are tired, lady, and evidently agi-Gallant had concluded the sentence which tated,' he said; 'and I fear much that some

Alice looked up with the same sparkling his feet, and turned fully towards the spot smile which had before played for a moment where the young lady stood; but the bars of on her countenance. 'You cannot deceive me!' she said. 'Hugh de Mortmar, do you

The Vert Gallant paused an instant as if in After the glance of a single instant, how- suspense, then threw his arms round the fair girl who stood beside him, and pressed her gently to his bosom. 'Dear Alice,' he said.

'how did you discover me?'

'It were vain to say how, Hugh,' replied Alice; 'I may have had suspicions long before; but from the day of the thunderstorm in the forest of Hannut I have not had a will lead you to a place where I can hear your and, as it would appear, to hide his face even from such strange companions, is more difficult to divine.'

'I am, indeed, willing, though not obliged, to hide my face even from the bulk of my galown face to the beard.

'You start, Alice!' he continued, 'and look piece of emptiness?'

'No!' she answered, 'no! But it is to ompanions. 'Indeed, Alice!' said De Mortmar with a Everything within bore an air of comfort smile. 'Then tell me, beloved, and put it and neatness hardly to have been expected fairly to your own heart, what is it that a man recover those things that have been snatched from his race by the unjust hand of power, and to free a father from captivity?'

'Nothing, indeed!' replied Alice, to whose bosom one part, at least, of the question went directly home. 'Nothing, indeed! and I will believe, with the faith of a martyr, that no other way existed for you to accomplish such an object; although till this time I knew not that you had either parent in existence.'

'But your father did,' replied the young cavalier; 'and when first I called these troops together, Alice-for you must not confound them with a band of lawless plunderers—when first I called them together, it seemed the only way by which I could ever hope to liberate my imprisoned father. I am Hugh of Gueldres; and it has been only the hope, and the promise of your hand, joined to the prospect held out by your noble father of obtaining my own parent's liberation by peaceful means, which has so long prevented me from asserting his right in arms, though the whole force of Burgundy were prepared to check me-I might say, indeed, to crush me,' he added; 'for though with the forces of Hannut, and all the discontented which the late Duke made in his own dominions, -with the aid of France, and, perhaps, of Austria,-my right and my good cause might have done much while Charles remained embroiled in foreign wars, I could have hoped for little had he once turned his whole force against me. But, as I have said, your father persuaded me to delay. For the years that I have thus been induced to pause I have been obliged to conceal the force of free companions I have raised as best I might; and no method of concealment could be more efficacious than that which I have adopted. As the Green Riders of Hannut we passed nearly unmolested, while the Duke of Burgundy pursued his ambitious schemes against Lorraine, and his mad ones against the Swiss; and though, if you recall the past events, you will find that the Green Riders have punished the guilty and the bloodthirsty, have laid many a plundering noble under contribution, and have levelled more than one stronghold of cruelty and oppression with the ground, yet not one act of baseness or barbarity can be traced to themselves.'

'Then why such necessity for concealing yourself from them?' demanded Alice, carried away for a moment from other thoughts by the personal interest she felt in her lover's conduct.

'What!' exclaimed the young cavalier; 'would you, dear Alice, have had me give so important a secret as that of my existence,when the Duke of Burgundy and all his court, nay, my own father also, thought me dead,would you have had me give such a secret as was his mind to be wrought upon in a day; that to the keeping of more than five hundred and Imbercourt was still busy in the difficult will not do-what that he should not do-to men? No! they were levied secretly by one who has been devoted and faithful to me through life,-good Matthew Gournay, who led you hither. The long-accumulated wealth of my more than father, the Lord of Hannut, served to gather them together. His forests and the catacombs under the castle gave them shelter: and, though far too strong in number to fear the weak bands of the Prévôt, or the force of any of the neighbouring nobles, it was absolutely necessary to conceal, with the most scrupulous care, from the court of Burgundy, that so large a body of independent troops existed, and still more that such a force was commanded by one who had cause for deadly hatred towards the Duke, now dead. Thus, by the advice and with the aid of the good Lord of Hannut, I mingled with the world as his nephew, under which title he had brought me up from my youth. But as it was necessary to keep my free companions in continual employment, and to acquire over them that personal authority, which nothing but the habit of commanding them could obtain, I was often obliged to assume the character of the Vert Gallant of Hannut, and lead them to enterprises, which, however dangerous, I took care should never be dishonourable. The very concealment of my person, which was revealed only to those who had previously known me, added a sort of mysterious influence to the power which general success gave me over them; and I believe that, at this moment, there is no enterprise, however wild or rash, to which they would not follow me, with the most perfect confidence.'

'But my father,' said Alice, reverting to the still more interesting topic of her parent's danger; 'I must speak with you of my father.

'Well, then, in regard to your father,' replied the young noble; and proceeding eagerly in his exculpation, he explained to Alice that Imbercourt had always lamented the Duke of Burgundy's severity to his parent, and had striven by every means to call the sovereign to a sense of justice, even before he acquired a personal interest in the house of Gueldres. The real name and rank of the supposed Hugh de Mortmar, the cavalier proceeded, had been revealed to her father, when Alice's hand had first been promised to him as the young heir of Hannut; and seeing at once that the design of liberating the imprisoned Duke of Gueldres, and recovering his duchy, was anything but hopeless, Imbercourt had only become the more anxious to obviate the necessity of such an attempt, by inducing Charles the Bold to grant as a concession what he might otherwise be forced to yield by compulsion. The purposes of the Duke of Burgundy, however, were not easily changed, nor task he had undertaken, when the defeat of superior whom they may never hope to gain, Nancy took place. On the other hand, he but rather with that rash and daring love, had ever laboured zealously to induce the which will make ambition but a steppingyoung heir of Gueldres to delay; and many stone to accomplish its bold purpose-which of those trifling circumstances which impede will see the land plunged deeper and deeper the execution of the best-laid schemes, had in bloodshed, in the wild hope, that out of combined, from time to time, to second his the ruins of ancient institutions, and the endeavours with Hugh of Gueldres. Friends and confederates had proved remiss or inmay build up for himself a seat as high, or capable,—supplies had been retarded. changes had taken place in the disposition or circumstances of particular states; and three times the young noble had been half persuaded, half compelled, to put off the attempt on which he had determined. All this Hugh of Gueldres poured forth eagerly to Alice of Imbercourt, too anxious to exculpate himself from all blame in the eyes of her he loved, to read in her looks the more serious cares that were busy at her heart.

the country,' added the young cavalier, 'although my father has been liberated by other means, it is my determination to keep my band together, and, watching every turn, to choose that moment which must come, when a small force, acting vigorously for one great purpose, may give the preponderance to right, and crush the wrong for ever.'

'Now then is the moment, Hugh de Mortmar,' cried Alice, clasping her hands eagerly; 'now then is the moment; if you feel any gratitude towards my father,-if you feel any love for me,-if you would uphold the right, -if you would crush the wrong,-if you would save the innocent from ignominious death.-lose not an instant, but force the rebel people of Ghent to free my unhappy father.

pected the danger of the Lord of Imbercourt, now started with surprise; and Alice, with the eager eloquence of apprehension, made him rapidly acquainted with the events which had occurred in Ghent during the to seek him.

'Ha!' cried the Vert Gallant, 'does task would allow. Albert Maurice-does the President of the vengeance on the prepetrators of the crime; sentiments, it would be to him.'

'He is ambitious, Hugh,' replied Alice, vehemently; 'wildly, madly ambitious. I have marked him well throughout-and you may trust a woman's eyes for such discoveries case required that Hugh of Gueldres should -he has dared to raise his thoughts to Mary instantly fix upon some plan for the deliverof Burgundy. He loves her,-deeply and ance of the Lord of Imbercourt, and proceed truly, I believe; -but he loves her not with to put it in execution without loss of time; the love which an inferior may feel for a and it was also necessary that Alice, whose higher, than the ducal chair of Burgundy. It is evident, Hugh,—it is evident, that he has the power as well as the daring to do much, and one of his first steps will be upon my father's head, -for had my father's will and counsel been followed, our fair and gentle princess would now have been the bride of the Dauphin of France, and every hour that he lives will be an hour of suspense and anxiety to that ambitious burgher.

A slight smile of contempt curled the lip of 'In the disturbed and dangerous state of Hugh of Gueldres, as Alice first spoke of the love of the young cittzen for the Princess of Burgundy; but it vanished speedily as she went on; and he shook his head with an air of thoughtful sternness as he replied, 'He is one to be feared and to be opposed, far more than to be contemned,—Alice, my beloved,' he added, taking both her hands in his, 'I must think what may be best done to save your father; and of this be assured, that I will lose not one moment in the attempt; but will peril life and fortune, and every future hope, to deliver him instantly.

And yet,' said Alice, while a deep blush spread over her whole face, 'for my sake be not over rash of your own person. Save my father, I beseech, I entreat! but, oh, remember that you too,—that you-

ther.'

Her feelings overpowered her, and she The young cavalier, who had never sus-finished the sentence by tears. Hugh of Gueldres pressed her to his bosom, and consoled her as far as the circumstances permitted. But on such occasions there is little to be said but common-place; and all he could assure her was, that while he made every morning, and which had thus brought her effort to save her father, her love would make him as careful of himself as the nature of the

In that day, however, every sport and States sanction such proceedings? I had pastime and occupation of man's life were of heard that when the unhappy Eschevins were so rude and dangerous a nature, that perils murdered by the populace, he took signal lost half their fearfulness from familiarity; and, though Alice of Imbercourt could not and, if ever I saw a man to whom I should but feel pained and apprehensive for her attribute noble feelings, and just and upright lover, yet her feelings of terror were much sooner tranquillised than those of a person in the present day could have been under similar circumstances.

In the meanwhile, the emergency of the return to Ghent would have been both fruit- seen, been arrested by their commands; but less and dangerous, should seek some safe this was not all, and every individual of asylum till her father's fate was decided. It was accordingly determined that she should instantly proceed to the castle of Hannut; and means for rendering her journey both safe and easy were arranged at once by her lover.

While the litter for conveying her thither was in preparation, and the soldiers destined to escort her were saddling their horses, Hugh of Gueldres stole a few brief minutes from more painful thoughts, for the enjoyment of her society, and the interchange of happy promises and hopes;—nor were those brief moments less sweet to Alice and her lover, because they were so few, nor because they were mingled with many an apprehension, nor because many an anxious topic intruded on the conversation. It is the light and shade, the close opposition of the dark and the sparkling, that gives zest even to joy. Hugh de Mortmar enjoyed it to the full for the time; but, the moment after he had placed Alice in the vehicle, given strict directions to the band which accompanied her, and had seen the cavalcade wind away into the dark paths of the wood, he gave himself up to less pleasing thoughts, summoned some of those from his troops, in whom he felt the greatest degree of confidence, and remained with them for a short time in close deliberation, concerning the measures to be taken for the relief of the Lord of Imbercourt.

A plan was soon determined; and an hour before daylight one of the band was despatched to Ghent, habited as a peasant, and charged to gain every information in regard to the proceedings of the council, but to hasten back with all speed, as soon as he had btained sufficient knowledge of what was passing in the city. In the meanwhile all was held in readiness, to act immediately upon the receipt of the tidings which he was to bring; and messengers were despatched in every direction, to prepare the bodies of Free Companions, scattered through the different woods in the neighbourhood of Ghent, for instant movement upon the city.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

MARY'S DIFFICULTIES.

WHILE such events had been passing without the gates of Ghent, the Estates of Flanders Brabant—as the members somewhat grandiloquently styled the anomalous assemblage which had been collected in that city had prolonged their sittings till night had shaken hands with morning. The Lords of any weight, who was clearly connected with what was called the French party at the court, had likewise been committed to prison. It may be necessary, however, to state how such a bold and sweeping measure, -a measure so full of difficulties, and so likely to encounter strenuous opposition,-had been carried

No favour was shown to any one; and, as soon as the assembly met, Albert Maurice, so averse, in general, to deeds of violence, proposed in quick succession, and with an eager light in his eye, which proved how deeply his personal feelings were implicated, the names of the victims who were to be exposed to the fiery ordeal of a public trial, under such an excited and furious state of the popular mind. With bold and sweeping positions, supported by extraordinary eloquence, he laid it down, in his opening address, as a first grand principle, that those who sought to unite Flanders with France were declared enemies to their native country; and he went on to assume, that even those who could show that no mercenary motive influenced them, were worthy, at least, of banishment, while those who could be proved to have been bought by France, merited nothing less than death. All this was readily admitted by his hearers; but the high rank and station of the first men that he then proceeded to proscribe, their fair reputation, and a long train of brilliant services to the state, caused no small feeling of surprise and apprehension to agitate the various members of the States, as they heard them named. But there was a power and an authority in the tone of the young President which overawed or carried away the greater part of his hearers; and the calm sneer, or cold philosophic reasoning of Ganay, who supported him, drove or induced many of the rest to yield.

Still it required but the strenuous opposition of some one individual, to rouse and lead a large party in the States against the bold and dangerous measures proposed; and to the surprise of all that individual was worthy Martin Fruse, who rose, and, after some agitated embarrassment, -occasioned both by the importance of the subject on which he was about to speak, and his dislike to oppose his nephew-found words to begin; and, once having done so, poured forth, with rapid utterance, one of those torrents of rude eloquence which generosity of heart and rectitude of feeling will sometimes elicit from the roughest and most untutored mind.

No, no, Albert! No, no, my dear boy! he exclaimed. 'No, no; it is very wrong,very wrong indeed! For God's sake, my friends and fellow-citizens, pause! let us be Hugonet and Imbercourt had, as we have wise and firm, but moderate and just. We We have recovered our freedom; we have re- foreign power; and, by making the most gained those ancient laws and usages which terrible example of such traitors, to deter were our blessing in the olden time, and others from similar treason,-without adwhich may bless us still, if we use them dis-ducing any weaker reasons. But to you, my creetly. But, fellow-citizens, remember, oh, uncle,-my best and kindest friend,-I am remember! there is a point where our own bound by love and gratitude; and-as the privileges end, and where those of other oldest and most revered member of the classes and other men begin. Let us not council-to you the States are bound by take one stride beyond the barriers of our reverence and esteem to yield every motive own rights; for surely, if we do, we shall, which can satisfy your mind. I, therefore, as sooner or later, be driven back with disgrace. one of the provincial council of the Princess, The man who, with power to right himself, may now inform you that one-half of that suffers another to rob him of his property, is councillittle better than a fool; but he who, because he has once been robbed, grasps at the pos- order,' whispered Ganay, laying a parchment sessions of another, is none the less a robber before the President, who instantly proceeded, and let them have them too. If they have the Bishop of Liege, would be ample authority wronged each other, let them right them- for such a proceeding. selves; and if they have wronged the state, whereby we may suffer too, let us carry up on the table before the rest, and slowly proour impeachment of their conduct to the foot- nouncing the names of the three princes who, stool of the Princess, and demand that they from the base motives of personal ambition or numbers, and in some sort, I will say, preju- fortunate nobles. Martin Fruse was silent; A man can very well judge others, may be, when he despises them; but no men can judge others that they envy. I know nothing would thus have escaped themselves from a of these two lords; and all I have heard of task for which, with all the will in the world, them makes me believe that they were good they wanted the necessary courage. and faithful servants of their Prince, so long as he was living; but if you have good cause to think that they have since betrayed their country to France, accuse them before the Princess and her council, and let them be judged by their equals.'

'What! and give them time to escape the pursuit of justice?' demanded Albert Maurice, sternly; but immediately assuming a softer tone, he added, 'Had any other man spoken the words we have just heard, I should have instantly called upon the States of Flanders not to entertain for a moment ideas which would go to circumscribe all their powers. I would have endeavoured to show that we have have done great things,-indeed we have. labouring to sell us at the highest price to a

'The Duke of Gueldres has signed the The nobles have their own privi- - that even a majority of the council have leges and their own laws; and right it is that consented to the arrest of these two men, the they should have them, for perhaps we are Lord of Imbercourt and the Chancellor less fitted, from our habits and situation, to Hugonet; and surely, did there exist no other judge them, than they are to judge us. But, right in this assembly to try them for their setting that point aside, we claim our own manifold and recent offences, the warrant of laws and our own judges, and we have ob- three such men of their own order as the tained them; the nobles, too, claim theirs, Duke of Cleves, the Duke of Gueldres*, and

As he spoke, he spread out the parchment be judged by their peers, according to law. revenge, had been induced to consent to such But on no account let us either arrest them a degradation of their class, he pointed with without lawful authority; and still less let us his finger in succession to their signatures presume, -a body of men superior to them in attached to the order for arresting the undiced against them, because we hold a lower the voice of every other person present was rank than they do, -and still less, I say, let raised for the instant execution of a warrant us presume to judge them, when we cannot, so signed, though many, by leaving the order from our very station, judge them impartially. without any further authority, would have gladly shifted the responsibility of the act upon those princes who had signed it, and

Albert Maurice, however, and several others, made of sterner stuff than the generality of the burghers by whom they were surrounded, had more extended views and more daring purposes, and were determined not to trust the execution of the vengeance they proposed to wreak to such doubtful friends as the Dukes of Cleves and Gueldres, and the Bishop of Liege. The first, indeed, had shown himself the bitter foe of Imber-

* The Dukes of Cleves and Gueldres were actuated, in the present instance, by very evident motives; the one wishing to obtain the hand of the Princess—which Imbercourt and Hugonet strove would have endeavoured to show that we have the representatives of the whole of Flanders and Brabant, to defend our existence as a nation, and our general interests as a free people, by arresting any one whom we find that the statesmen had determined to save brought over a large majority of the hearers; the country, if possible, from foreign invasion, and the warrants were sent forth bearing the by uniting Mary of Burgundy to the heir of names of the whole assembly. A number of the French crown. To the Bishop of Liege other persons, less obnoxious, were then, as I Imbercourt had long been a personal enemy; have before said, added to the list of those and the Duke of Gueldres had motives of his to be secured; and the meeting of the States own, or rather motives suggested by Ganay, did not break up till the fearful work of profor seeking to alienate the unhappy minister scription had been dreadfully extended. from the councils of the Princess. Each, however, of these great lords, Albert Maurice member, bowing low to the President,-who well knew, was willing to compound for the had the day before taken possession of a suite exile of the minister, and to spare his life; of apartments in the Stadthuys, and now but he himself judged rightly, when he made it his dwelling, -left the town hall, and thought that Imbercourt, in power or in departed. Ganay alone remained, and he banishment, would never cease his efforts to did so on a sign to that effect from Albert execute the design he had laid out, till he Maurice; who, when all the rest were gone, were dead, or the scheme accomplished; and and the doors closed, leaned his folded arms Albert Maurice resolved that he should die. upon the table, and buried his brows upon He tried hard to convince his own heart that them, as if utterly exhausted with all the his intentions were purely patriotic; but his fatigues of the day, and the struggle of many own heart remained unsatisfied. Yet, having a potent passion in the arena of his own once yielded to the promptings of the worse bosom. The dull flames of the long-burnt spirit, the burning doubt in his own bosom, lamps but dimly illumined the wide vacant in regard to the purity of his motives, but hall, and its dark wainscot; but the great urged him on the course he had chosen with cresset hung just above the head of Albert more blind and furious impetuosity, in order Maurice, and as the light fell upon the to escape from the torturing self-examination bright curls of dark hair dropping over to which conscience prompted him con- his arms, and upon the magnificent head and and dangers on every side, - obstacles alike shining upon some fallen spirit, in the first opposed to his ambition, to his love, and to lassitude of its despair. Nor did the withered his aspirations after liberty. He believed form of Ganay, with his shrewd keen eyes himself to be in the situation of a mariner fixed upon the young citizen, and his cheek on a narrow bank, over which the ocean shrunk and pale with the long workings of threatened every instant to break, and over- passions,-concealed by subtlety, but not the whelm both himself and the vessel of the less potent on that account, -offer a bad state; and he resolved at once to push off image of some dark tempter, enjoying his into the midst of the stormy waves, in despite triumph over the fall of a better being, then of the fears of his companions, believing that writhing before his eyes under the very his own powers could steer the ship safely, fruition of its first evil hopes. and that their feebleness must yield him the sail.

The timidity of some, the subtlety of others, the wilfulness, the self-conceit of all, he saw could only be bent to his purposes by plunging them in an ocean of difficulties, from which he alone could extricate them; and, undermatters not. We will lead them safely standing well the characters of those by whom through. But now tell me-How was the he was surrounded, and prepared to make their talents, their influence, their wealth, their vices, their very weaknesses, subservient to his one great purpose, he resolved to involve them all in schemes of which he alone knew the extent.

At once, therefore, he rejected the idea that the warrant, signed by the three Princes he had named, was sufficient; and though he allowed their names to stand first, he urged upon those who heard him, that the States thenceforward all pretence to real power, court from the moment he had discovered His arguments and his authority easily

The assembly then rose; and member by He saw around him difficulties form which those curls adorned, it seemed

It was Ganay who began the discourse, and command, till he had piloted her into the the tone of his voice at once roused Albert port for which he had already determined to Maurice from his momentary absence of mind. 'They have all plunged in now, indeed!' said the druggist. 'I thought not they would run before our will so easily.

Duke of Gueldres won to our wishes? He owes his freedom as much to Imbercourt as to any one. Is he then so base a slave as he has been pictured? Is the soil of his heart really so fertile in weeds, that good service produces nothing thence but ingratitude?

'Nay, nay, my young friend,' answered the druggist, while a bitter sneer lurked round his lip, at the very candour he assumed; 'you are beginning to think sadly ill of mankind. They are not so bad a race as you believe. must also join in the same act, or forfeit Like all great patriots, you affect to despise the very world you would shed your blood to her husband.

transactions of thirty years ago are not so golden crown. deeply buried beneath the dust of time as most secret deeds; and once more, I say, beware!

had referred boldly to events in the past, that he bestowed upon Mary of Burgundy, which Ganay had supposed forgotten; and the and the flattering picture he drew of his ashy cheek of the druggist grew, if anything, hearer's probable success, soothed, pleased, a shade paler than before, while, for a moment, and softened Albert Maurice, and wiped serve. No, no; the Duke of Gueldres, good a glance of amazement, most unwonted to his honest man, would be as grateful as his guarded features. It passed off, however, in neighbours, if no more powerful motive came an instant, and a flash of something like in the way of gratitude. You forget, Albert anger succeeded in its room. But that, too, Maurice, that we are teaching him to believe passed away, and he replied calmly, but that his pretensions to the heiress of Bursomewhat bitterly, 'I will beware, But you, gundy are full as good as those of the sottish too, Albert Maurice, beware also. There are heir of Cleves; so that, whoever seeks to give some things that it is not well to discuss; her hand to a stranger, is an enemy to Adol- but if you can trace—as for aught I know or phus of Gueldres, who counts boldly on being care perhaps you can-my whole course of er husband.'

The cheek of Albert Maurice flushed, and know that I am one whose yengeance is then grew pale; for often in the dull and somewhat deadly; and that however strong then grew pale; for often in the dull and filthy trade of worldly policy, we must work with tools we are ashamed to touch, and employ means abhorrent to man's better nature. Thus, though obliged to balance one mean soul against another, as suitors for her he himself loved, it stung the young aspirant to the very heart to hear their pretensions calmly named by any other human pling; and giving way to the first burst of indignation, he exclaimed, 'Out on him, vile swine! But beware, sir druggist, beware how you raise his mad dreams too high! and still more beware,' he continued, as a sudden suspicion seemed to cross his mind, awakened, as had been frequently the case before, by the sheering tone in which the druggist sometimes spoke; 'and still more beware how you dare spoke; 'and still more beware how you dare Doubtless you fear not me: but let me tell to play into his hands. Mark me, sir, and, you, Albert Maurice, that I am as fearless as grasping Ganay by the arm, he bent his dark yourself,—nay, something more so—for there brow upon him;—'mark me! I know you well, and you know me, but not so well! artfully preached upon, by monks, and priests, You think you use me as a tool, because, to a and knaves, and tyrants, which you fear, and certain point, you have succeeded while following my steps, and have obtained, and are aside; it is wisest and best for us both tools alour on together, without suspicions of each but learn and know that you have succeeded other. If, as you say, you know the secrets so far, only because the interests of the state of the past, you well know that I have no mighty cause to love 40clphus of Gueldres. and your own desires have been bound up mighty cause to love Adolphus of Gueldres. together. It is, that those whom you seek to destroy have given you the means of destroy and to make him raise his eyes to the hand of ing them, by rendering it necessary that I the sweet and beautiful Princess of Burgundy, should strike them; not, as perhaps you I have but followed your own directions, and dream, that you have bent me to your pur-pose. You see I know you, and some of his power over the people, and his hope of your most secret thoughts. But hear me that bright lady are, when compared with further ere you reply. Learn, too, that the yours, but as a feather weighed against a

The firmest heart that ever beat within you may think; and that, though you and man's bosom is, after all, but a strange weak Adolphus of Gueldres may meet as strangers thing; and,—though feelings very little short now a-day, I have dreamt that there was a of contempt and hatred were felt by the time when ye knew more of each other. So young citizen for his insidious companion,now, you see, I know you, and some of your though he knew that he was false and subtle. and believed that even truth in his mouth was virtually a lie, from being intended to de-It was the second time that Albert Maurice ceive, -yet, strange to say, the goodly terms he gazed upon the face of Albert Maurice with away, for the moment, many of the individual suspicions he had been inclined to entertain start not! She loves another. What, man, before. It must not be supposed, however, are you so blind? I had fancied that all that those suspicions thus obliterated did not soon return. They were like the scratches on an agate, which a wet sponge will apparently wipe away for ever, but which come back the moment that the stone is dry again, and cloud it altogether. He knew Ganay too well, he saw too deeply into the secrets of his subtle heart, to be ever long without suspicion of his purposes, though artful words and exciting hopes, administered skilfully to his passions, would efface them for a time. If this weakness, -and it certainly was a great one, -did not influence his conduct, it was, perhaps, as much as could be expected from

'I mean not, Ganay,' he said, 'either to taunt you or to pain you: but as our objects are different, which you admit yourself, I do you no wrong,—even on your own principles, -in supposing that as soon as those objects are no longer to be gained by aiding and supporting me, you will turn to some one whose plans may better coincide with your own. My purpose, then, in showing you how thoroughly I know you, is, that you may have the means of seeing that it would be dangerous to abandon my interest for that of any other person; and that you may balance in your own mind the prospects and difficulties on either side. But, as you say, to drop this and different feelings may oppose us hostilely to each other, tell me, candidly and fairly, upon his ultimate failure; for did I believe that there were a possibility of his success, I would slay him myself ere such a profanation should take place: and as he spoke he fixed his eyes upon the face of the druggist, in order to make the expression of the other's countenance a running commentary upon the words he was about to reply.

'I think,' replied the druggist, firmly, and emphatically, 'that Adolphus of Gueldresstigmatised by the pure immaculate world we membering, that if you let them escape, even live in as the blood-stained, the faithless, the into banishment, you may look upon the mar-perjured, the violator of all duties and of all riage of Mary of Burgundy with the Dauphin rights—has as much chance of obtaining heaven as of winning Mary of Burgundy. tell you, Albert Maurice, that she would consequences. Even supposing you could sooner die, -ay, die a thousand times were it brook your personal disappointment, and possible, than wed the man she has been taught to hate from her infancy.'

liberation of the Duke of Gueldres; AI believe she would, indeed.'

sides, she loves another. Ay, Albert Maurice, heirs of France and Burgundy, the whole land your hopes, and one-half your daring, had birth in that proud consciousness.

Never dreaming that his companion would so boldly dilate upon what was still but one of the most indistinct visions of hope, even within his own bosom, -a vision, indeed, which was the prime motive of all his thoughts and actions, but which he had never dared to scrutinise carefully, -Albert Maurice, with all the irritable jealousy of love, had instantly concluded that Ganay, in the first part of what he said, had alluded to some other object of the Princess' affection, and his cheek for a moment turned pale, till the latter part of the other's speech set the blood rushing back into it with renewed force.

'Mark my words,' continued Ganay: ' mark my words, and see whether, by the grey dawn of to-morrow, you are not sent for to the palace. But remember, Albert Maurice, that though patriotism may lead a man to the summit of ambition; and though love, as well as glory and authority, may become the fitting reward for services rendered to his country, yet, in the path thither, he must never sacrifice his duty for any of those temptations, or he will surely lose all and gain nothing.

A slight smile passed over the features of Albert Maurice, -whose passions, in this insubject, and never to resume it again, unless stance, did not interfere to blind his native the day should come when separate interests acuteness, as he saw what use his artful companion could make of the words duty and patriotism, while it served his purpose, though do you think that, if we encourage the popu- at other times he might virtually deny the larity of him of Gueldres in opposition to the existence of such entities. 'How mean you?' proud Duke of Cleves, we may safely count he said. Your position, good friend, is general; but you have some more particular object in it.

'I mean,' replied Ganay, 'that should Mary of Burgundy use all those sweet words, which love itself teaches woman to employ in moving the heart of man, in order to shake your duty to your country, and make you work out the safety of two convicted traitors, you, Albert Maurice, must have firmness enough to say, No, even to her you love, reof France as sure as that you yourself exist. Look, too, a little farther, and think of the calmly see her you love in the arms of the weak boy of France, what would befall your 'I believe she would,' murmured the country? Already one half of the nobles of young citizen, calling to mind the demeanour Burgundy and Flanders have gone over to the of the Princess, when giving the order for the French. Already half our towns are in possession of Louis, that most Christian knave; and at the very first breathing of the news that a 'Besides,' continued the druggist, 'be- treaty of marriage was signed between the their country, would be poured out in the streets of Ghent, to expiate the crime of patriotism.

'Fear not,' replied Albert Maurice: 'proved as it is, beyond all doubt, that these two men have dared to negotiate the sale of their native land to him who has been its great enemy, there is no power on earth that could induce me to interpose and save them from the outstretched arm of justice. They shall be fairly heard, and fairly tried; and if it be provedwhich it cannot be-that they are guiltless, why let them go, in God's name, as free as the blast of the ocean; but, if they be condemned, they die, Ganay.

'So be it,' said the druggist; 'in this instance, at least, justice to your country is your only chance of personal success; and now, good night, and every fair dream attend you.

Thus ended their long conference; and Ganay, descending from the hall, woke his two sleepy attendants, who were nodding over an expiring fire in the vestibule below. Each instantly snatched up his sword and target, to conduct his master home, for the streets of Ghent were not quite so safe since the death of Charles the Bold, as they had been under his stricter reign. A boy with a lantern preceded the druggist on his way homeward; and as he walked on across the Lys towards the church of St. Michael, the subtle plotter bent his eyes upon the ground, and seemed counting the stones, as the chequering light of the lantern passed over them. But his thoughts were not so void of matter; and he muttered words which showed how deeply some parts of his late conversation, - which seemed to affect him but little at the time,-had in reality sunk into his heart. 'He is quieted for the present,' he said, 'and he must do out his work, -but he must die, -I fear me he must die; and yet my heart fails me to think it. Why and how did he learn so much? and why was he mad enough to breathe it when he had learned it? But I must think more ere I determine. Those papers! he added,—'those papers,—if I could but get at those papers! Whatever hearsay knowledge he may have gained, he could make out nothing without those papers.

While thus-muttering to himself broken sentences of the dark purposes which dwelt within his own bosom—the druggist pursued his way homeward, Albert Maurice retired to his bed-chamber in the town-house, and sum- of a bright and gentle soul as ever mortal eye moned his attendants to aid in undressing rested on; and as Albert Maurice gazed upon him. No man really more despised the it, half shrouded as it was by the long black pomp and circumstance of state; but since mourning veil which the Princess wore in he had taken upon himself the government of memory of her father's death, he could not would rush forward to pass beneath the yoke, little less, -he had in some degree affected a while the blood of those who sought to save style of regal splendour, and attendants of all kinds waited his commands. The necessity of captivating the vulgar mind by show, and of impressing on the multitude respect for the office that he held, was the excuse of the young citizen to himself and others; but there was something more in it all than that, -a sort of flattering stimulus to hope and expectation was to be drawn from the magnificence with which he surrounded himself; and he seemed to feel, that the thought of winning Mary of Burgundy was something more than a dream, when he found himself in some sort acting the monarch in her dominions. He felt, too, - and there might be a charm in that also, -that he acted the monarch well; and that the robes he had assumed became him, while the native dignity of his whole demeanour, and the unaffected ease with which he moved amidst the splendour he displayed, dazzled the eyes of those that surrounded him, so that he met nothing but deference and respect from all.

He slept that night as calmly in the couch of state, as if he had been born amongst the halls of kings; and he was still in the arms of slumber, when a page woke him, announcing, as Ganay had predicted, that the Princess required his presence at the palace with all speed. He instantly rose, and dressing himself in such guise as might become him well, without incurring a charge of ostentatious presumption, he proceeded to obey the summons he had received; and was led at once to the presence of Mary of Burgundy.

The Princess, as usual, was not absolutely alone; for one of her attendants,-the same who had accompanied her during the thunderstorm in the forest of Hannut, now remained at the farther extremity of the room, but at such a distance as to place her out of earshot. It was, indeed, as well that it should be so, for Mary was prepared to plead to her own subject for the life of her faithful servants. an humiliation to which the fewer witnesses admitted the better. The feeling of the degradation to which she submitted, was not without a painful effect upon Mary's heart, however gentle and yielding that heart might be; and the struggle between anxiety to save the ancient friends of her father and herself, and the fear of descending from her state too far, wrote itself in varying characters upon her countenance, which weeks of painful thoughts and fears had accustomed too well to the expression of agitated apprehension.

It was still, however, as beautiful a picture Flanders,—for the power he had assumed was but feel that there was a power in loveliness like that, to shake the sternest resolves of his unable to bring such a thing to pass. Wilto every varying expression of Mary's face; and without the vanity of believing that all he self.' saw spoke encouragement to himself, he could not but dream that the colour came and hopes would have led him to believe. Sel- The act was mine, not theirs, as under my dom called to converse with him but in mo- commands they went. ments of great emergency, Mary was genehim, too, she met one of a class with which I do; and what unjust means must have she was unaccustomed to hold any near com- been used to induce you, I can full well mune; and, at the same time, there was a divine. power, and a freshness, and a graceful enthusiasm in all the young burgher's demea-voluntary act, -done upon due consideration; nour, which never can be without effect upon and no one is to blame, save myself. so fine a mind as that of the Princess. Perhaps, too-though had she ever dreamed ing in a low but solemn tone, 'if you, indeed, that such a thing as love for her could enter do wish for this French alliance, -if you deinto his imagination, she would have been as sire to unite yourself with your father's perticold as ice itself-perhaps, too, she might nacious enemies,-if, as your own voluntary feel that there was something of admiration act, you would give your hand to the puny in the young burgher's eyes, which she would boy, whose numbered days will never see him not encourage, but at which she could not sovereign of France, and who can alone serve something to check, had she not felt afraid of nexing your territories to his own,-if, I wounding and alienating one whom it was her say, such be your own sincere desire, I will, best interest to attach. Nevertheless, it might most assuredly, state it to the States Genebe the very desire of doing so, and the fear of ral. giving pain, that agitated her still more, and rendered her manner more changeful and re- of my two faithful servants?' demanded Mary, markable.

Such were their mutual feelings,—varying through a thousand fine shades, which would require a far more skilful hand than that which now writes to portray, -when they met on that eventful morning, the sovereign to solicit and the subject to deny.

the cause of the call he had received to Mary's not still most guilty, though your Grace was presence; and the occasion having once been prevailed upon to sanction it. Nor, lady, explained, she went on, with gentle but must you think that such a sacrifice on your a glistening eye, to beseech him, by every motive that she thought likely to move his is not an unbought man in all Flanders who heart, to save the lives of her faithful servants.

heart, and turn him all into weakness. The lingly, most willingly, would I lay down my agitation of his own feelings too,—the hopes own life for your service, madam, and be that would mount, the wishes that would not proud to die in such a cause; but to pervert be repressed,—rendered him anxiously alive the course of justice would be a far more bitter task to Albert Maurice than to die him-

'But remember, sir, oh remember!' replied Mary, 'that we are told to show mercy, as we went more rapidly in her cheek, that her eye hope for mercy; and still further remember, more often sought the ground while speaking that, in their dealings with France, the Lords to him, than in the most earnest consultation of Imbercourt and Hugonet were authorised with her other counsellors. Perhaps, indeed, by my own hand; and if there were a crime it was so; but from far other causes than his therein committed, I am the criminal alone!

'Your Grace is too generous,' replied the rally more moved at such times than on other young burgher, 'to take upon yourself so occasions, and when agitated, the eloquent great a responsibility, when, in truth, it is blood would ever come and go in her cheek, none of yours. How reluctant you were to with every varying emotion of her heart. In treat with France, none knows better than

'Nay, nay, indeed!' she said, 'it was my

'If, lady,' rejoined Albert Maurice, speakfeel offended, and which she might have done to furnish a new claim to Louis XI. for an-

> 'If I say that it is so, will it save the lives anxiously, while her heart beat painfully with the struggle between the desire of rescuing her counsellors, and her shrinking abhorrence of the marriage proposed to her. 'Will it, tell me, will it save them?'

'I cannot promise that it will,' replied Albert Maurice. 'The States must decide A few words explained to Albert Maurice whether those who counselled such an act are zealous eloquence, with a flushed cheek and part would achieve even the pacification of France and Burgundy. Be assured, that there would not shed the last drop of his blood ere he would consent to the union of the two 'Indeed, dear lady,' he replied, 'you at- countries. Nor do I believe that Louis of tribute to me more power than I possess; for France himself would accede. He claims the much I fear, that, even were I most anxious whole of your lands, madam, upon other to screen two men, accused of selling their titles. Burgundy he calls his own by right of native land to a foreign prince, from a judi- male descent; the districts of the Somme he cial trial and judgment, I should be totally declares to have been unjustly wrung from the crown of France; and the counties of occasionally cut off his beams from different Flanders and Artois, he says, are his of right, though he has not yet deigned to yield a specification of his claim. Doubtless he has striven to buy your servants and your counsel'look there!' said Mary of Burgundy—

'look there!' Is not that a fair scene?' she proach.

found but too strong.

Mary stood aghast-not that she believed should find means of making even such a pretext against those whose honour seemed to her too bright for such a stain to rest upon them for a moment. 'Oh, save them!' she exclaimed, at length, with passionate eagerness. 'Save them, sir, if you love honour, if you love justice! Look there,' she continued, advancing to the high window of the apartming rapidly towards the horizon, leaving the the ante-chamber attracted the attention both sky every moment more blue and clear, of the Princess and himself. Ghent lay yet half asleep beneath the palace, with its rivers and its canals constantly gleam- tones of the Duke of Gueldres. with their tall spires, broke the monotony lors both by birth and blood?' both of colour and form, and pleasantly dia fair undulating country met its view, inter- to give you my best advice. spersed with deep, brown woods, from which, and the Lys, with every now and then an ac- me, sir, and I know not in whom I may now cidental turn of the 'Lieve, were seen glisten- trust.' ing like streams of silver through the distant prospect. Over all the ascending sun was replied the Duke; but Albert Maurice interpouring a flood of the soft light of spring, rupted him. while the clouds, as they flitted across the sky, lors; and many of them has he purchased— added, after a moment's pause. 'Is not that not to promote your union with his son, a beautiful land?—Is it not a proud and pleabut to betray your lands and cities into his sant thing to be lord of cities like this, and power.' countries like that before you? Yet let me 'But these faithful friends,' said Mary,- tell you, sir, I would sacrifice them all. 'these noble gentlemen whom you now hold would resign power and station, the broad in captivity, are all unsoiled by such a re- lands my father left me, the princely name I own-ay, and never drop a tear to know them 'Your pardon, madam,' replied Albert lost for ever, so that I could save the life of Maurice, gravely; 'such is one of the chief those two noble gentlemen now in such peril crimes with which they are charged. Good by false suspicions. Oh, sir, I beseech; I evidence, too, it is said, can be produced entreat; and did it beseem either of us, I against them; and though I have not myself would cast myself at your feet to implore examined the proofs, yet I fear they will be that you would save them. You can,—I know you can; for well am I aware of all the power which, not unjustly, your high qualities have the accusation for a moment, but that any one obtained amongst your fellow citizens. Oh, use it, sir, for the noblest, for the best of purposes !-use it to save them at my entreaty, and for my sake.

As she spoke, agitation, eagerness, and grief overcame every other consideration, and the tears streamed rapidly over her fair cheeks, while, with clasped hands, and raised-up eyes, she sought to move her hearer. Nor was ment, and pointing with her hand to the scene he unmoved; on the contrary, he was shaken spread out below—'look there!' to the very heart. That stern determination to the very heart. That stern determination Al bert Maurice gazed out in some surprise. which he thought virtue, the ambition which It was, indeed, as fair a sight as ever he had rose up beside patriotism, and was beginning looked upon. The situation of the casement to overtop the nobler shoot—all were yielding at which he stood commanded an extensive to the more powerful force of love; or if they view over the whole country round. The sun had not risen above an hour. The world was which they could not withstand. His temples in all the freshness of early spring. The mists throbbed, his cheek turned pale, his lip and dews of night, flying from before the quivered, and words were rising to utterance first bright rays of day, had gathered together in thin white clouds, and were skim- nations, when quick steps and loud voices in pating rapidly towards the herizon beginn roughly towards the herizon beginning the same than the had not risen above an hour. The world was which they could not withstand. His temples in all the freshness of early spring. The mists throbbed, his cheek turned pale, his lip and developed the fact of the herizon beginning the herizon that the herizon beginning the herizon beg

'Stand back, sir,' exclaimed the coarse ing in here and there amongst the grey, sober- Lord, if the Princess is in council with any coloured houses, while innumerable monas- one, as you say, the more reason that I should teries, with their green gardens, and churches, be present at it. Am not I one of her counsel-

By this time he had thrown open the door; versified the scene. As the eye wandered on and, striding boldly into the chamber, he adover the walls, past the suburbs, through a vanced with a 'Good morrow, fair cousin: if maze of green fields and young plantations, you be in want of counsellors, here am I ready

Mary's cheek turned pale as he approached; every now and then, rose a village spire, or a but she replied, mournfully, 'My best and feudal tower, while the windings of the Scheldt most tried counsellors have been taken from

'Trust in me, fair cousin, trust in me,'

'I believe, sir,' he said, 'that it is customary for the Princess, when she wants the gravely, but not angrily, 'your apology is counsel of any individual, to send for him, more due to yourself than to me. It was and for none to intrude themselves upon her the Duke of Gueldres you lowered: Albert without such a summons. I having been so Maurice you could not degrade; and as to honoured this morning, and having received crossing you, my lord,-that man's violence her commands, shall now leave her, doubting must be a much more terrible thing than not that she will be well pleased that we I have ever met with yet, that could scare both retire.'

'School not me, sir citizen,' replied the Duke of Gueldres, fiercely; 'for, though you fly so high a flight, by the Lord I may find it necessary some day to trim your wings.'

Albert Maurice replied only by a glance of withering contempt, which might have stung the other into some new violence, had not Mary interposed. 'I did not think to see such wrangling in my presence, gentlemen,' she said, assuming at once that air of princely dignity which became her station; !I would be alone. You may retire!' and for a single instant the commanding tone, and the flash.

father Charles the Bold.

The rude Duke of Gueldres himself was abashed and overawed; and, having no pre- accidental, and endeavouring, as he rode on, tence prepared for remaining longer, he to fix with certainty upon the person who bowed, and strode gloomily towards the door, had given that Prince the information on satisfied with having interrupted the conversation of the Princess and Albert Maurice, of which he had from some source received in-The young citizen followed, not sorry to be relieved from entreaties which had nearly overcome what he believed to be a virtuous resolution, although-with that mixture of feelings which scarcely any circumstance in human life is without, -he was A DAY intervened: but at noon on that which however dangerous that society might be to house of Ghent. tone, 'Remember! oh, remember!'

stairs before him, with a heavy step and a but by far the greater part of the people regloomy brow. Nevertheless, that Prince, mained perfectly silent, with their eyes turned whose cunning and whose violence were al- towards the town-house, immediately in front ways at war with each other, only required a of which stood a scaffold, hung with black short time for thought, to perceive that he cloth, supporting two low blocks of wood, could not yet, in the bold designs which had and surrounded by a large party of the been instilled into his mind, dispense with burgher guard. A still larger body of the same the assistance and support of the young citi- troops kept the space between the scaffold zen; and he determined, as speedily as pos- and the public building before which it was sible, to do away any unfavourable impres- placed; and, in all, the armed force present left upon the mind of the other.

'i' faith I have to beg your pardon for some- fortnight, both by an extended levy amongst should not cross me.

me from crossing him when I felt it my duty to do so.'

The Duke of Gueldres bit his lip, but made no reply; for there was a commanding spirit about the young burgher, which, supported by the great power he possessed in the state, the other felt he could not cope with, at least till he had advanced many steps farther in popular favour. He turned away angrily, however, seeing that conciliation was also vain; and, flinging himself on his horse, rode off with the few attendants he had collected in haste, to accompany him to the palace.

Albert Maurice returned more slowly to the ing eye, reminded those who saw her of her town-house, clearly perceiving that the coming of the Duke of Gueldres, in the midst of his conference with the Princess, had not been which he had acted.

CHAPTER XXIX. THE EXECUTION.

pained and angry, at the same time, to be followed, an immense dense crowd was asforced to quit the society of one so beloved, sembled in the open space before the town-Nevertheless, though the his fancied duties. He bowed low as he de-parted; and Mary, dropping the tone of au-Square of St. Pharailde had contained before, thority she had assumed, with clasped hands, there was a stillness about it all, which and an imploring look, murmured in a low spoke that men were anticipating some great event. Each one who spoke addressed his The Duke of Gueldres proceeded down the neighbour in that low tone which argues awe; sion which his rude insolence might have seemed more than sufficient to keep order, and overawe the evil-disposed. In fact, the 'Master Albert Maurice,' he said, as soon regular municipal power had been increased as they had reached the vestibule below, to an extraordinary degree during the last what sharp speech but now. Good sooth, I the citizens themselves, and by the raising of am a hasty and a violent man, and you a number of extraordinary companies from amongst the peasantry of the neighbouring 'My Lord Duke,' replied Albert Maurice districts, joined to all such disbanded soldiers

a great part of this body were drawn up between the town-house and the scaffold, and in the main court of the building.

At the same time, it is to be remarked, that almost all the burghers, and a number of the peasantry of the country round about, had provided themselves with warlike weapons, the death of the Duke; so that the multitude which thronged the space before the townprincipal weapons with which they had furnished themselves were long pikes; and any one gazing over the market-place might have a say in the matter as any one else. fancied it crowded by an immense body of sons with somewhat hard features and along the file of men that he commanded, but steady movement forward, they gradu- other side.' ally made their way one by one through the occupied all their vacant moments by looking about them, which was, that close to the head of one of the bands of the burgher guard, and conversing from time to time with the officer who commanded it, appeared a young man of a powerful and active form, dressed as a common man-at-arms, with the beaver of his helmet, at what was called the half-spring; in short, so far open as to give him plenty of air, yet not sufficiently thrown up to expose his face. In those days, it must be remembered that the appearance of men in armour had nothing extraordinary in it, either in the country or the town, and consequently such a sight was not at all uncommon in the streets of Ghent at any time; but had become far more so since the burghers had assumed the authority they now claimed, as not a few of the rich young merchants, every now and then, chose to ape the nobles, whom they were desirous of overthrowing; and would appear in the streets clothed, like the ghost of Hamlet's father, in complete steel.

as were willing to enrol themselves under the the stranger addressed himself, was or was banners of the commune. The trained force not previously acquainted with the man-atthus at the disposal of the town-council of arms, he seemed well pleased with his com-Ghent amounted to at least seven thousand pany, which certainly somewhat tended to men, and, on the morning of which we speak, relieve the irksome anticipation of disagreeable duty. Their conversation, however, soon appeared to turn upon more important matters; and they spoke quick and eagerly, though in so low a tone, that only a few words of what they said reached the by-

'I wish them no ill, poor wretches, God since the first disturbances which followed knows,' the captain of the band was heard to say, in reply to something the other had whispered the moment before. Two or three house appeared universally in arms. The indistinct sentences succeeded; and then, he again answered, 'If any one would begin, I would follow! we have as good a right to

Again the man-at-arms spoke with him dismounted lancers; but, at the same time, rapidly; and the other rejoined in a low a number of the more wealthy were provided and hurried tone-'Stay! I will see what with swords also; and one or two appeared the men say! Stand back, sir!' he added, more in the guise of regular men-at-arms pushing back, angrily, one of the crowd, who than simple citizens. It was remarked that intruded upon the open space, and came amidst the assembly were a number of per- within earshot. He then walked leisurely weather-beaten countenances, habited in the speaking a few words, now to one, now to ordinary dress of peasants, but in general another; and then, turning back with an better armed than the rest of the people, air of assumed indifference, he said to the These men seemed to have but few acquaint- person with whom he had before been speakances in the town, but wherever any two of ing, 'It will do! They do not want any more them met, they appeared instantly to recog- blood spilt. They are all murmuring, to a nise each other; and, by a quite unobtrusive, man. Go and speak with the captain on the

While this was passing in the immediate crowd, to the immediate vicinity of the scaf- vicinity of the scaffold, several of the persons Another circumstance, also, was re- I have described as looking like weathermarked by those people in the crowd who beaten peasants, had, in making their way through the crowd, paused to speak with a number of the citizens, at first asking some questions in regard to the multitude, and the dark preparations before the town-house, as if ignorant of what had lately taken place in the city. They then generally proceeded to comment on the reply made to them; and then something was always said about the shame and horror of staining their marketplace with public executions for state crimes which the events of a few weeks might render no crimes at all.

Thus, one of them demanded of a fat burgher, by whom he passed, 'Why, what is the matter, neighbour? This looks as if they were going to cut off some one's head.'

'And so they are, to be sure,' replied the citizen. 'They are going to do execution upon the Lord of Imbercourt and Hugonet the Chancellor, who were condemned this morning for treating with France and receiving

'Ay, did they receive bribes?' rejoined the peasant; 'that is strange enough; for I Whether the captain of the band to whom always thought that they were as free and liberal of their gold to those who needed it, in the direction of the town-house, mingled as any men living, and coveted nothing be- with shouts of 'They are coming !- they are longing to another; and those are not the sort coming!' of men, I have heard say, who usually receive swered the citizen, with a sigh.

'But did they really receive bribes?' persevered the peasant. 'Was it clearly proved?'

not get; but there was strong suspicion.'

the King of France and Court of Peers,'

'Why, so they both did,' replied the citizen, but they are to die for all that.

the market-place in such a way while I had a crowd in every direction, with no longer any voice to raise against it.'

a man would cry out against it too.

some one will cry out against it.'

Thus speaking, the peasant, as he seemed to be, pushed his way on for a little distance, and then, pausing by another of the citizens, held with him a short conversation, like that which we have just narrated, asking very the captain of the burgher guard, 'do your nearly the same questions, and making very nearly the same observations on the answers he received.

The instance which has just been particularised was only one out of many; for in of the guard, eyeing him eagerly: 'who are every part of the crowd were to be seen persons similar in appearance to the man whose case as this?' conversation we have just detailed, and who his way round to speak with the person who over his shoulder. commanded the company at the other side of The signal had an instantaneous effect. the scaffold. As, in his apparent military The brown coarse coats of the peasants were capacity, he strode boldly across the space thrown off, and they appeared armed in steel kept clear in front of the scaffold, and conse- corslets and brassards, while the distinctive quently encountered none of the impediments marks of the well-known Green Riders of which might have delayed him, had he at- Hannut were seen boldly displayed in the tempted to proceed through the crowd, he midst of the streets of Ghent. Although where would, probably, soon have accomplished each of these men was making his way onthis purpose; but at that moment a con- ward, and at the point where so many had

The ear of the man-at-arms immediately caught the sound. He paused for a single 'Ay, that is true enough, indeed!' an-instant; and then taking a step back to a spot whence he could descry the intermediate space between the scaffold and the town-house, he saw a body of people moving from the prin-No, no, I believe not,' replied the citizen. cipal entrance of that edifice, through a 'Proof they could not get-proof they could double line of the burgher guard. The procession consisted of a number of the municipal Tis hard a man should die for mere sus- council, a body of various officers of the state, picion, though; for who would be safe if that Maillotin du Bac, the prévôt maréchal, two were law?' answered the other. 'If I had executioners with naked axes, and the unforbeen one of them, I would have appealed to tunate nobles Imbercourt and Hugonet, bound and bareheaded.

The man-at-arms instantly perceived that he would not have time to accomplish what 'Then I would not be a citizen of Ghent he proposed; and with three strides he placed for ten thousand crowns, answered the pea- himself once more by the side of the officer sant; 'for, by the Lord, Louis and his peers with whom he had before been speaking. will be like to hang every one of them that he Gathered at the same point were, by this catches; and it is a sad thing to be hanged time, at least a hundred and fifty of the for spilling innocent blood. Were I one of the citizens of Ghent, they should never stain described; and, forcing their way through the affectation of ceremony, or regard to the con-'Ay, ay, it is very sad!' said the citizen: venience of those they thrust out of their way, and I daresay if any one would begin, many there appeared a number of others perfectly similar in appearance. The eyes of the whole 'Well, well,' answered the other, 'I must of this distinct body were evidently turned forward, and see what is going on; and I hope upon the man-at-arms; and it was observed some one will cry out against it.' something enveloped in the flap of his coarse brown coat, as if to be given at a moment's notice.

'Now,' said the man-at-arms, addressing duty as a brave man, as a good citizen, and more,-as a good Christian, and you shall have plenty of support.

'But who are you?' demanded the captain you, who so boldly promise support in such a

'I am the Vert Gallant of Hannut,' replied acted precisely upon the same plan, though the man-at-arms; and at the same moment, the words they made use of might be slightly stretching back his hand to the peasant be-different. The man-at-arms who had been hind him, he received a broad green scarf talking with the captain of one of the city and plume, the one of which he fastened inbands, in accordance with the intimation he stantly in his casque, and waved the other, for had received, was, in the meantime, making a moment, high in the air before he threw it

The signal had an instantaneous effect. siderable noise and disturbance was heard already congregated, this sudden change occasioned a considerable sensation; yet the great proximity of his followers, drew forward his his eye happened to catch different points in the scene that was passing in the square.

'They are coming! they are coming!' shouted some. 'Where?' where?' exclaimed others. 'Who the devil are these?' cried those who saw the Green Riders. 'Death to the enemies of Ghent!' vociferated the fierce. 'Poor wretches! will no mercy be shown to them?' said the pitiful. 'What a large axe! how pale they look! Who are those behind?'

cried others of the crowd.

In the meanwhile, the mournful procession came on. The new Eschevins of Ghent, elected by the people themselves, mounted the scaffold, and ranged themselves around, to see the sentence they had lately pronounced carried into execution. The two executioners took their places by the blocks, and leaned the axes which they bore against them; while they made themselves ready to go through the preparatory part of their sad function. The condemned nobles followed after; and several members of the municipal council-but Albert Maurice was not amongst them-closed the whole, and occupied the only vacant space left at the back of the scaffold. At the same moment a gentleman in splendid arms, half concealed under a surcoat of costly embroidery, followed by a number of richly-dressed attendants, forced his way rudely through the crowd, and thrust himself close to the foot of the scaffold, on the opposite side to that where the Vert Gallant had placed himself. He then crossed his arms upon his broad, bull-like chest, and stood gazing upon the awful scene that was proceeding above, with a look of scaffold. ruthless satisfaction.

The Lord of Imbercourt at once advanced to the front of the scaffold, and gazed round upon the multitude before him. He was very pale, it is true; but his step was as firm as when he strode the council-chamber in the height of his power: and not a quiver of the lip, not a twinkle of the eyelid, betrayed that there was such a thing as fear at his heart.

'Must I die with my hands tied, like a common felon?' he said, addressing the exe-

'Not if your lordship is prepared to die without offering resistance,' replied the other.

fearlessly.

The executioner began to untie his hands; round the crowd, apparently to ascertain the this fact is minutely accurate.

body of the crowd was agitated by so many sword-belt, and loosened the weapon in the different feelings, and the general tumult was sheath. Imbercourt, at the same time, was at that moment so great, that the transaction advancing as far as possible, as if to address, passed with only casual notice. Almost every, the people, and the whole multitude, seeing it, one throughout the multitude was, indeed, kept a profound silence; when suddenly, in moved by sensations of his own; and each the midst of the still hush-just as the Vert nearly at once gave voice to those feelings, as Gallant of Hannut was passing round the head of the file of burgher guards, till he was within a few steps of the scaffold itself-a sweet and plaintive voice, which would have been inaudible under any other circumstances, was heard from amongst the crowd, exclaiming, 'Oh, let me pass; for God's sake, let me pass! they are murdering my faithful servants. Let me pass; in pity, in mercy, let me pass!'

'It is the Princess! It is the Princess!' cried a number of voices: 'let her pass! let her pass!' and, by an involuntary movement of feeling and compassion, the people drew hastily back on either side, and Mary of Burgundy, in the deep mourning of an orphan, with her bright hair escaped from her veil, and flowing wide over her shoulders, her face deluged in tears; and her hands clasped in agony, rushed forward into the open space, and, casting herself upon her knees before the people of Ghent, exclaimed aloud the only words she could utter, 'Oh! spare them;

spare them ! '*

'Yes, yes,' cried an honest burgher from the crowd, 'we will spare them. Out upon it! has not the Prince always had power to show mercy? Hark ye, neighbours, pikes and swords for Martin Fruse! On upon the scaffold! We will save them!' 'Back, false citizen; back!' cried the cavalier in the glittering dress we have described. 'What, would you interrupt the course of justice? By the sun in Heaven they shall die the death;' and, drawing his sword, he threw himself between the people and the

All was now tumult and confusion; and in one instant it seemed as if a general spirit of civil strife had seized upon every part of the multitude. Some shouted, 'Mercy for them! mercy for them!' Some, 'Justice! Justice! slay the traitors!' Pikes were crossed, and swords were drawn on all sides. The burgher guards were as divided as the people. Mary of Burgundy was borne fainting behind the scaffold; and those upon the scaffold itself seemed paralysed by surprise and fear. But the green scarfs and burgonets of the Riders of Hannut were seen forcing their way forward through the press, in spite of all opposi-'I am prepared, sir,' answered Imbercourt, tion; and at the same moment the thundering 'to die as I have lived-calmly, honestly, voice of the Vert Gallant was heard rising,

* It may be necessary to inform those who are and the Vert Gallant, giving one glance not deeply read in the chronicles of France, that brought him upon his knees. He was still, ever, we must now turn. however, between the young cavalier and the It was on the evening of the day, whose scaffold; and, fierce with the eagerness of sanguinary commencement we have already the encounter, Hugh of Gueldres drew back noticed, that, placed calmly by a clear wood his arm, to plunge the point of his sword into fire, with all the means of comfort and even the throat of his opponent, when the voice of luxury around him, Ganay, the druggist, sat one of the cavalier's attendants exclaimed pondering over the past and the future. aloud, 'Save the Duke, for God's sake! Neither he himself, nor Albert Maurice, had Save the Duke of Gueldres! Forbear, for- appeared at the execution of Imbercourt and bear!'

friends!'

prostrate enemy with feelings that can be fied, the other naturally abhorring scenes of understood, when we remember that it was blood. The druggist, however-though where his own father, who, beaten down by his it was necessary he neither wanted courage to superior strength, lay within an inch of his undertake, nor hardihood to execute the most sword's point, raised for the purpose of termi- daring actions—was ever well pleased to let nating their struggle by his parent's death. His eyes grew dim-his brain reeled-the of an enterprise, employing the time, which sword dropped from his hand, and he fell would have been thus filled up by action, in consciousness,

At the same moment, the axe of the executioner swung high in the air-there was a dull, heavy blow-a rush of dark blood poured over the scaffold; and the Lord of Imbercourt was no more.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE VERT GALLANT PRISONER.

It is a sad thing for a calm, retired student, passions which sometimes animate his fellow-boy; and when he contemplated the difficul-beings; and it is scarcely possible to tell how ties he had surmounted to bring about that above everything else, 'On, on to the scaffold, worn and shaken his whole frame feels, after friends of mercy!' he cried. Lord of Imber-hurrying through some scene of angry violence court, east yourself over, you are amongst and wild commotion. He meets, indeed, with compensations in pursuing his task. There Imbercourt might have done so; but he was may be a high and indescribable pleasure in instantly seized by Maillotin du Bac and one portraying the better qualities of human of the executioners, who unhappily awoke nature in all their grand and beautiful traits; from their first consternation in time to prevent in describing sweet scenes of nature, and in him from seizing the opportunity which was striving to find latent associations between the unexpectedly presented to him. The Vert various aspects of the lovely universe and the Gallant, however, pushed forward, sword in mind, the feelings, or the fate of ourselves and hand. All gave way, or went down before our fellow-men. Nay, more, there may be him; the pikes opposed to his breast shivered some touch of satisfaction-part self-complalike withered boughs beneath his arm; and cency, part gratified curiosity-in tracing the he was within a yard of the spot where Imber- petty qualities of humanity mingling with the court stood, when he was encountered, hand finer ones, the mighty and the mean counterto hand, by the cavalier we have before men- balancing each other within the same bosom; tioned; and each found that he had met an and in discovering that the noblest of reenemy very different from the burghers by corded earthly beings is linked on to our little whom they were surrounded. Each was selves by some fond familiar fault or empty powerful and skilful; but the Vert Gallant vanity. But at the same time, though not so had, by more than twenty years, the advantage wearing as to paint the struggle of mighty of his adversary; and feeling that the fate of energies called forth on some great occasion, Imbercourt must be decided in the twinkling it is even more painful, perhaps, to sit and of an eye-for the guards and executioners draw the same strong passions working by were forcing him down to the block - he inferior means, and employing the low and showered his blows upon his adversary with treacherous slave, Cunning, instead of the a thundering rapidity that in a moment bold bravo, Daring. To such a picture, how-

Hugonet-the one careless of what else The Vert Gallant paused, gazing upon his occurred, so that his bitter revenge was gratimore careless fools perform the perilous parts back upon the pavement, without power or thinking over the best means of reaping his own peculiar harvest from the seed sown by others. He now revolved every circumstance of his present situation, and scanned the future —that dim and uncertain prospect—with steady eyes, determined to force his way onward, through its mists and obstacles, without fear and without remorse. The predominant sensation in his bosom, however, was gratification at the consummation of his long-sought revenge. The man whom he most hated on earth, who had offered him a personal indignity, and who had refused pardon to his son, he had sent to join the unhappy magistrates to sit down and depict the fierce and terrible who had condemned that base and flagitious to his designs; when he contemplated, I say, the whole course of his triumphant machinations, there rose up in his bosom that pride of speaking of the unhappy Imbercourt, 'he is successful villainy which is so often the ulti- dead, and that score is cleared. mate means of its own punishment by the daring confidence which it inspires.

to men as well as women. Where was there ever the man who paused at one evil act? Ganay had previously determined to limit all his efforts to the death of the Eschevins and of Imbercourt; but his very success in that endeavour had entailed the necessity, and furnished the encouragement, to new, and, if possible, less justifiable acts. Nevertheless, it must not be thought that there was no such thing as a thrill of remorse ever entered his bosom. There probably never yet was a man, however he might brave it to the world, who, with a bosom loaded with crimes, did not feel remorse when solitary thought left him a prey to memory. Conscience is an Antæus, that, strong indeed who can strangle it altogether. Remorse mingled its bitter drop even with Ganay's triumph; and while he gazed upon the crackling embers, the joy of his successes faded away-a feeling of age, and solitude, and crime, crept over his heart; and the memories of other years, the hopes and dreams of boyhood and innocence, rose up, and painfully contrasted themselves with the mighty disappointment of successful vice. Through new schemes and the intricacies of tortuous policy; but now he had learned another way of lulling the mind together with the body, small silver cup half full of ardent spirits, and then swallowed in its contents a certain portion of that narcotic which he had found so the vial, he again took his seat before the fire, and listened, as if waiting for some visitor.

He was not kept long in expectation; for, entered without farther announcement. The wizard shall roast in the market-place of Brusand his lip curled with triumph; but he had, by this time, learned the influence of Ganay in the affairs of Ghent too completely to treat all, from the time I was at the castle. I told him with aught but the most profound defer- the Lord of Imbercourt that his nephew was ence. After some formality, he took the seat the brigand leader—you may ask him if I did act of vengeance-the schemes he had formed that Ganay offered; and hypocras and wine and perfected—the events which he had turned having been brought in, with spices and comfrom their natural course, by his sole art, to fits, he helped himself largely, and then, at accomplish his purpose—the men he had used the request of the druggist, recapitulated the as instruments, and the passions he had bent events connected with the execution of the morning, which we need not repeat.

Ganay, I give you joy, with all my heart! Your son's death is nobly avenged, and you The maxim of Rochefoucault is applicable can sleep in peace. Now give me joy in return.

'I do! I do! Sir Prévôt,' replied Ganay, grasping the hand the other held out to him in his thin fingers: 'I do! I do, with all my heart !

'But stay! stay!' cried Maillotin du Bac, 'you do not yet know for what. Hark ye, Master Ganay, revenge is sweet to every honourable man. Did you ever hear tell of the Vert Gallant of Hannut? Did you ever hear how he overpowered me by numbers, and disgraced me as a man and a knight? He delivered you proud Albert Maurice, too, when he was a less worm than he is now. Well, he it was, who, as I tell you, encounthough often cast to the earth by the Hercu-tered the good Duke of Gueldres, and would lean passions of man's heart, rises ever again have slain him, had not his own foot slipped, re-invigorated by its fall; and he must be or some one dashed him down, and the Duke was rescued.

'Well, well, what of him,' cried the druggist; 'what has befallen him?'

'Why, he is safe in the prison of the townhouse,' replied the Prévôt, 'and shall die after seven days' torture, if I live to the end of them. His fellows, somehow, cut their way through, and got out of the press, every one of them; but he himself was trodden down as he lay, by the people, and was taken up by life he had found many means of stifling such the burgher guard half dead, after the crowd murmurs of the heart, in the excitement of dispersed. We shall have to give him two or three days to recover. There is no use of killing him like a rat caught in a trap, you know, and just knocking his head against the and, rising with his usual calm and quiet stones, without letting him know why or pace, he approached a cupboard, poured a wherefore. No, no; we must give him time to recover his strength and his senses, or he will die upon the first wheel. But there is more, there is more to be told still,' cried the soothing under the first anguish of his son's Prévôt, rather heated by the wine, and seeing Then carefully replacing the cup and that the other was about to reply, 'Who, think you, this famous long-concealed Vert Gallant proves to be at last? Who, but the nephew of that old sorcerer, the Lord of in a very few minutes after, the door was Hannut—and by the holy cross, if ever I live opened by the boy, and Maillotin du Bac to see quiet times again, that vile, heathenish cheek of the Prévôt was flushed with wine, sels, if there be such a thing as law and religion in the land. I knew it all the time! Bless you, Master Ganay, I saw through it for he is dead-but I told him, nevertheless, sent; and as we may have many things to Master Ganay, here's to you!'

Ganay had turned somewhat pale as the fill. other spoke, but he showed no farther sign of discomposure, and replied, immediately,-'His nephew! you must mistake. He has no a voice, the tremulous tone of which the Prémore pellucid by the wine he had drunk, attributed to the painful remembrance of his own loss,—'He once had a son; but the boy died in infancy.'

'Nay,' replied Maillotin du Bac, 'of that I know nothing. All I know is that this youth is his nephew-this Sir Hugh de Mort-mar.'

be,' rejoined the druggist, somewhat sharply. 'No nephew has he. Surely I should know.'

'Well, well, 'tis all the same,' cried the 'évôt. 'If not his nephew, he passes as such; and die he shall, after the torture has wracked his every limb. Ay, Master Ganay, he shall die, he added, clasping his strong and sinewy hand tight, as if holding some substance which he was determined to let no it. power on earth wring from his grasp; 'he shall die, although your precious president were to give his right hand to save him; and if, out of what he calls his fine feelings, he attempt to repay the good turn the Vert Gallant did him at Hannut, and free him from prison in return, he may chance to stumble at that step himself, and die along with him. forgot. So let him look to it.'

words of his companion, who spoke evidently under the excitement both of passion and drink. The wine, however, had not very deeply affected his discretion; and the moment after remembering the close connection between the druggist and Albert Maurice, the Prévôt thirty years ago since I first heard much of added, 'Not that I mean any harm to your friend, Master Ganay, only let him not meddle with my prisoner, that is all. I am sure I have not sought any vengeance against him was his courage better than his prudence. He himself, simply because he is your friend; and had—as well you know he still has—ample will not, if he keeps his hands from interfering with my affairs.

Still Ganay was silent, and remained musing, with his eyes bent upon the fire, till he as often to be pinched for a hundred florins. discomposed by his companion's taciturnity, and imagining that he had made a blunder in regard to Albert Maurice, -- was again about to apply to the bowl of spiced wines, as the best means of restoring his confidence and composure. At that moment the druggist, stretching out his hand, caught him gently by livered at their pleasure-house of Lindenmar. the arm, saying, 'Stay, stay, Master Prévôt, All this went mightily against the stomach of not, -though, by the way, he won't answer, we have both had enough of that for the prethat I was sure it was the old man's nephew. speak of which require cool heads, let us refrain till all is settled, and then drink our

'Well, well, 'tis the same to me,' rejoined the Prévôt, relinquishing the bowl, and taking his seat once again. 'What would you say, nephew. He once had a son!' he added, in Master Ganay? Command me, for you know that we are linked together by the same invôt, whose faculties had not been rendered terests, and, therefore, are not likely to differ.

'Well, then, listen for a moment, good Sir Maillotin, while I just tell you a few things concerning this Lord of Hannut, which, though they belong to the days past, do not the less bear upon the days present.'

The druggist then paused, and again mused for a moment in deep thought, ere he pro-'But I tell thee, good friend, it cannot ceeded; and in his countenance there was that air of deep calculating thought, which may often be seen in the face of a skilful chess-player, when pausing, with suspended finger, over some critical move. At length he went on. 'We must both serve each other, Sir Maillotin; and if you will aid me in what I propose, I will help you to what you wish, though you dare not even hope for

'Speak, speak! Master Ganay,' replied the Prévôt; 'and fear not that I will refuse to serve you willingly and well. We have drawn vastly well together yet; and there is no danger of our not doing so to the Still, however, the druggist hesitated for some minutes'; for though he could assume a I owe him something, too, which I have not false frankness as well as any one, he was not, by nature, at all communicative, and what he Ganay mused for several minutes over the had resolved, upon long deliberation, to propose to the Prévôt, required a more full confidence than he could place in any one without pain. 'I will tell you a story,' he said, at length, - 'I will tell you a story, good Maillotin du Bac. Listen then. 'Tis just two-andthis Lord of Hannut, who was then a bright, brave young cavalier, whose life was not to be counted on for two hours together, so much wealth and large possessions, while his cousin, the present Duke of Gueldres, whose father was then living, was so munificent a prince, perceived that Maillotin du Bac, -somewhat Report said that the young Duke, who was then heir to Hannut, piously wished that his gallant cousin might find the road to heaven speedily. But, as fate would have it, the Lord of Hannut one day unexpectedly married, and within a year, his fair lady made him the father of a son, of which she was de-

the good young Lord of Gueldres, whose not present; and under all these circumand nobles. had the lands of Hannut.'

'He had better have kept that to himself,' interrupted the Prévôt, shaking his head sagaciously. 'No man has a worse enemy than wishes, for they are never long in discovering one's designs afterwards.

'He has marred all his good fortune through life,' replied Ganay, 'by those rough sayings of his; for though he says no more than other men think, yet he makes all men that hear while confessing his own.

'However,' continued the druggist, after this sage and liberal observation, 'down he came with the rest, of course, to make them think what he had said was a mere joke, and plunged into the flames with the foremost. All was confusion, and no one knew what the other was doing. The Lord of Hannut their being given up to me, lest it should seem himself was stunned by the fall of a beam upon his head, and was with difficulty dragged out by his servants. Thibalt of Neufchâtel, his great friend and brother-in-arms, carried out the lady unhurt, through the midst of the flames; but the heir of Hannut perished; and, for some hours, no one could tell what had become of Adolphus of Gueldres.'

'Why, you describe it all as well as if you had been there yourself,' said Maillotin du Bac.

'I was there,' replied the druggist, dryly; of Neufchâtel's head, I know not; but after saving the lady, he rushed back again into the house; and finding me in the further wing, he dragged me out by the hair of the head, vowing that I had kindled the fire. Now you must know that I was then a humble friend Gueldres; and when they searched my person, they found a number of letters which they thought of very doubtful meaning, and a few drugs, the use of which their ignorance could not comprehend, and which they wanted much to prove were materials for secretly lighting a flame. The good Duke, too, was father, then living, kept him on scanty means; stances, they had nearly killed me on the spot. when, by another strange turn of fate, the I took it all silently, for a man can but die pleasure-house of Lindenmar was burnt to the once in this world, and very little does it ground, and the infant son of the young Lord matter when that once may fall. All I said of Hannut perished in the flames. As for- was, to call my young lord, for that he would tune would have it, a detachment of Duke clear me; and they agreed, at length, to Philip's army was marching over the hill, spare me till the Duke, that is at present, within sight, at the time, and with it was my could be found. He was not heard of, howgood Lord of Gueldres, together with Thibalt ever, till the next day, when it was discovered of Neufchâtel and a number of other knights that he had retired to a neighbouring village, As soon as the fire was dis- much scorched by the flames. He instantly covered, they all galloped down to put out despatched a letter to the Lord of Neufchâtel, the flames; and my Lord of Gueldres might informing him that he himself had sent me to have passed for as zealous a friend as the rest, inquire after the health of his fair cousins, the had he not been fool enough to cry out, as if Lord and Lady of Hannut, which was the in jest, to let the whole place burn, so that he cause that I had not been seen accompanying him with the rest of the army. The servants of the household of Lindenmar vouched for my coming the evening before on that errand, and gave a good report of my proceedings. his own tongue. The good Duke should have The Lord of Hannut himself joined to excul-learned better than to let people know his pate me; and I easily found means to convince Thibalt of Neufchâtel that he had grossly ill-treated me, and foully aspersed my character. Had he continued to treat me ill, I might have devised a way to satisfy myself; but, on the contrary, as soon as he was convinced of my innocence, nothing would serve him his enemies, by exposing their feelings him to testify his sorrow for what had occurred, and to compensate the injury he had inflicted. He kept his eye upon me through life, and, I may well say, has been the origin of all my fortunes. The proofs he gathered together of the charge against me, and of my innocence, he has always kept in his own possession; and I have not chosen to press for that I was afraid of anything therein contained. Do you understand me?

'Quite well,' replied Maillotin du Bac, drawing his clear hawk's eyes together, with a shrewd glance upon the druggist's face;

'quite well. What more?'

'Why, this,' answered the druggist,-'I love not to be in the power of any man. While Adolphus of Gueldres was in prison, and likely to remain there, -while Thibalt of Neufchâtel was living, and likely to live,-'but you shall hear. What put it into Thibalt the matter did not much signify; but now that Adolphus of Gueldres is free, and Thibalt of Neufchâtel is dying of the wounds he received at Nancy, it might be as well that those papers were in my own possession. Thus, then, it must be managed, Sir Prévôt : you must find some excuse to take possession and domestic surgeon to the young Duke of of his house with your men-at-arms the moment the breath is out of his body; and while you are sealing up the effects I may be looking for the papers,

But what suppose I keep them in my possession for you? demanded Maillotin du Bac, with one of his shrewd looks.

'Why, then,' replied the druggist, calmly,

'I cannot aid you in overthrowing Albert in this business. To take men off except Maurice, and in obtaining possession of his by the cord or the steel, when they have person and his wealth.

'I understand, said the Prévôt; 'we are agreed. But what surety have I that you will do so when you have the papers?'

'This,' answered Ganay, without any expression of indignation at a doubt of his honesty, which he felt to be perfectly natural, but, at the same time, approaching closer to the Prévôt, and speaking in a low, but clear and emphatic tone,- 'this, that Albert Maurice-by what means I know not-has discovered my secret, and must die.

better than a bond! We are agreed, we are agreed, mine excellent good friend. But hark ye, Ganay, there is one bad stone in the arch. This Thibalt of Neufchâtel—this good Count Thibalt—is marvellously better to-day, would seem that the death of Imbercourt and Hugonet had done him good; for about the time of the axe falling he began to mend.

Ganay, as was his habit when he heard any unpalatable tidings, replied naught, but fixed his eyes upon the fire and mused. 'He is an old man,' said the druggist, at length, speaking in a low and quiet voice,- 'he is an old man, this good Count Thibalt.'

'Ay, doubtless is he,' replied Maillotin du Bac, who was one of those people who take a keen delight in discovering difficulties and objections solely for the sake of giving pain and disappointment; but he is a hale old man, and may live these twenty years if he get over this bout?'

'He must have had enough of life,' continued Ganay, in the same meditative tone. 'It is time he were asleep. Adolphus of once: it is time he were asleep.

considering his hawk-like features for a moment or two with an inquiring glance, added quietly, 'Well, well, Sir Maillotin, we will see. These sudden gleams of convalescence often his boy, he tottered to his bed in silence. precede death in the badly wounded. I know these matters better than you do, my good friend; and I have no faith in this sudden and strange amendment. Let us keep ourselves in readiness, and wait the result. You will be prepared at a moment's notice,' he added, in a more sharp and decided tone, throwing off at once the quiet conversational manner of his former speech ; ' perchance he may die to-morrow-perchance the next day; but be you on the watch, and ever ready to secure the house.

'I will! I will!' answered Maillotin du Bac; and then speaking to the druggist's purpose more than to his words, he added, I will be ready to secure the house and all that, Master Ganay; but I can do no more a clear spring-tide night, like that, -while all merited their fate, is out of my line of operations.

'Who required you to do so?' demanded the druggist, gravely. 'No, no, Sir Prévôt, men may die without your help or mine either. So, now to the bowl! We understand each other, and that is enough. Be you ready when I send to warn you that the good Count is dead. If he live, you knowwhich is likely-vastly likely; if he livewhy all the rest is in the moon. Sir Prévôt, I carouse to your good rest this night. Do 'Good! good!' replied the Prévôt; ''tis me justice-do me justice in the bowl!'

Thus ended their more important conversation; and all that passed farther referred to the mysteries of the tankard, and need not be here inflicted on the reader. It may be necessary to observe, however, that the druggist did not suffer the Prévôt Maréchal to leave his house till he had imbibed a sufficient quantity of various kinds of intoxicating liquors to require the aid of two stout men to bear him home; and that Ganay himself was, at the same time, incapable of quitting the chair in which he sat. It may be asked, was a man of such subtle schemes an habitual drunkard, then? Far from it, though he could drink as deep as any one when some object might be gained by so doing but he was one of those men whose limbs only be-come inebriated, if we may use such an expression, while their brain remains unclouded; and the debauch in which he indulged was one of calculation, not pleasure. He had soon seen that, in the case of the Prévôt, the prudent guard which was usually placed upon his lips was half asleep at his post long before their conversation was over; and though he Gueldres has visited his sick couch more than believed that he could trust to old habits of caution to keep his companion from any in-The Prévôt was silent; and Ganay, after discreet babbling, either drunk or sober, yet he determined not to let him leave his dwelling till utterance itself was drowned in wine. Of himself he had no fear; and, leaning on

CHAPTER XXXI.

ALBERT MAURICE VISITS THE PRISONER.

OH, the dull silent hours of the night, when not a sound stirs upon the heavy air to steal one thought from man's communion with his own dark heart !-- when the stern silence renders the sleep that covers all the world more like one universal death, and everything around us bids our conscience scan the brief records of our past existence, and prejudge us for the long eternity! The days had been, when, on the countless stars seemed living diamonds in those eternal stars.

been so during the greater part of the day; termined step, from the feeling of the dark, for such was the awful sensation produced in stern deeds which he had done. Descending Ghent by the events of the morning, that all one of the staircases, he came to that portion the shops were shut, and every kind of busi- of the building which was set apart as the ness was very generally suspended. Even the municipal prison; and, proceeding to a small affairs of the city seemed to be neglected by chamber or lodge, he demanded the keys of general consent. Neither the council of the the gaoler, who was dozing by the fire. town, nor the deputies of the states, returned higher functionaries alone that seemed to feel day, found himself, at night, left in utter soli- Prévôt's guard, seated upon a stone bench at thoughts, or any voice to plead his cause against the accusation of his own conscience.

that he had acted justly. He read over the evidence against the dead. He read over the sentence of the judges. He thought over all the many specious reasons that had before manded, sternly, what the soldier did there, seemed to afford a thousand clear and patriotic excuses for sweeping away those whose views were likely to thwart his own: but the reasons had lost their force; the sentence was manifestly unjust; the evidence was broken and inconclusive. At all events, he thought the act was not his; the award had been pronounced by the lawful magistrates of the land; and he had taken no part either in the himself has no authority. Get thee gone, judgment or its execution. But that pretext good fellow—you know me—get thee gone; would not avail a moment before the stern inquisitor within; and he felt that he, in whom the real power lay, if he did not interpose to shield the innocent, made himself responsible for their blood.

The heart of man cannot long endure such the heaven, -Albert Maurice, full of fine soul racking self-examination; and the most danand noble aspirations, would have gazed forth gerous resource, but the only refuge from preenchanted; and, without one heavy tie besent pain, is flight from thought. As sad an tween his heart and the low earth, would hour's commune with himself as ever sinful have bade his spirit soar up in grand calm human being passed, ended in a resolution to dreams to heaven-when, between him and think no more of the unchangeable hours of the multitude of bright orbs that sparkled be- the past, and to fix his mind upon the prefore his eyes, there would have been felt a sent. After pausing for a moment, during communion and a sympathy; and when the which his ideas wandered confusedly over a knowledge that each wondrous frame was the number of objects, without finding any subcreation of the same Almighty hand would ject of contemplation of sufficient importance have awakened in his bosom a feeling of kin- to hold his thoughts, for an instant, from the dred with the living lights of the sky. But engrossing theme that ever called them back now, how heavy was the night! how dark! with painful importunity, some sudden memory how hopeless! how reproachful! There was seemed to come across him; and, taking up a voice even in the solemn stillness; and the one of the lamps, he proceeded into the anteblood, which yet reeked upon the scaffold be- chamber, in which waited several of his attenneath the very windows of the apartment where dants. Giving the light to a page, with he sat, seemed crying up, through the silence orders to go on before, the young citizen paced of the universe, to the Judge enthroned above slowly through several of the halls and corridors of the town-house, his footfall, ever firm He was left, too, entirely alone, and had and proud, taking now a more heavy and de-

The man immediately delivered them; and, to consult over the future; nor was it the passing onwards, the President of the States entered the gloomy dwelling, and descended this sort of bewildered apathy. The clerks the staircase which led to the lowest cham-and secretaries were absent; not above one bers of the prison. He was surprised, howor two of the many couriers usually in attend- ever, to perceive a light; and, in a moment ance were now found in readiness; and Albert after, in the low passage which ran between Maurice, after having endeavoured, in vain, six or seven small heavy archways leading to to occupy his mind with business during the the cells, his eye fell upon a trooper of the tude, to revolve the tragedy of the morning, the end, employed in furbishing the steel of without any other things to distract his his partisan by the light of a lamp above his head.

The man instantly started on his feet; and. He strove, however, to convince himself challenging the party that approached, advanced his weapon, till it nearly touched the bosom of the page. But Albert Maurice, stepping past the boy, put the pike aside, and dein the municipal prison.

He was there, the man replied, by order of his captain, and was commanded to give admission to none, but the gaoler with food for the prisoner.

'Your officer is somewhat too bold,' replied the young burgher, 'and must answer for having dared to place a sentry where he and let me not see your face within these walls again.'

The man at first hesitated; and at length refused to obey, alleging, civilly, the commands of his own captain, which he was and power of the person whom he addressed, for the freedom you then gave me. he spoke with courtesy and respect; but Albert Maurice was in that state of dissatis- fully, and cast his eyes upon his stiff and fied irritation, which the first reproaches of rigid limbs, as if to express the impossibility conscience leave upon a fine and energetic of his accepting the proffered liberation. mind; and, returning to the upper chambers, 'Fear not, fear not!' said Albert Mau-he instantly summoned a guard, caused the rice, in reply to this mute language. 'Fear soldier to be disarmed, and confined him in not; in two or three days you will be able one of the very dungeons he had been placed to watch.

There was a stern fierceness in the whole thraldom. proceeding, unlike his usual decisive but mild demeanour; and those who watched him well remarked, that upon his mind and character, through the whole course of his life, that day had left a trace which no afterevents could obliterate. When he had seen his orders obeyed, he dismissed the guard, self as well as he could upon his arm,and bidding the page wait him on the stairs, he advanced alone to one of the cells and safe? Is he unhurt? I struck him down beapplied the various keys he carried to the fore I knew him; but I do not think he lock. It was some time before he found the right one; and he thought he heard more dark and dismal enough.

ceived the face of Albert Maurice, a slight before. smile of pleasure played on his lip. It was criminal he might hold some of his visitor's freebooter's fire in the forest?' deeds to be.

The young citizen set down the lamp, Maurice. and seated himself on a rude wooden settle, ber me?

'Well-very well,' replied the young cava- boy, and I am he.' lier, faintly; 'we have changed stations since

Maurice, 'to follow the good example you he muttered to himself, 'that the bereaved bound to follow. Well knowing the station then set me, and to give you back freedom,

Hugh de Mortmar shook his head mourn-to use your limbs as freely as ever, and I will find means to remove from them all other

'But my father,' said Hugh de Mortmar. 'Tell me, I beseech you, tell me!--Is he safe? Is he unhurt?

'Your father!' repeated Albert Maurice,

in some surprise, - ' your father?'

'Yes, yes,' cried the prisoner, raising him-'my father-the Duke of Gueldres!-Is he was injured.'

'No, no,' replied the young citizen, 'the than one low groan, while employed in open- Duke is safe and well. But this, indeed, is a ing the door. At length, however, he suc- strange tale. I do not comprehend you well, ceeded, and entered the dungeon, which was I fear,' he added, inclined to believe that the injuries the prisoner had received had ren-Stripped of arms, both offensive and defendered him delirious. Can the Duke of Guelsive, and stretched upon a pile of straw, lay dres be your father? I never heard that he the gallant and enterprising Hugh de Mort-mar, as we have generally called him, with say, by one of the cruel soldiers of the late every limb powerless and rigid, in conse- Duke of Burgundy's father, when Adolphus quence of the trampling and blows he had of Gueldres himself was taken near Namur. received while trodden under foot in the I remember all the circumstances; for there market-place. His fine head leaned languidly was many an event occurred about that time upon his arm, while, with a motion which, which impressed the whole story more deeply however slight, seemed full of anguish, he on my memory than other things that have turned a little as he lay, to see who it was happened since. I was then a boy, travelling that visited his prison. The light, for a mo- with my uncle through the forest of Hannut, ment, dazzled his eyes; but when he per- and we had been at Namur not three days

'Ha! and were you that boy?' demanded a face he knew-it was a being on whom he the young cavalier. 'I remember you well. had some claim that came to visit him; and You fell into the hands of the free companions it is only necessary to think over his situation with whom I then was, and were sent on -friendless, a prisoner, and alone, with every safely by them, and by my father's noble mental power oppressed, and every corporeal cousin, the Lord of Hannut. Mind you the faculty rigid and benumbed—to comprehend boy who joined you, with good Matthew what joy such a sight would give, however Gournay, when you were sitting round the

'Well, perfectly well,' replied Albert

'Then, that was the son of Adolphus of which was the only article of furniture Gueldres,' replied the prisoner, 'escaped that the place contained. Bending down from the hands of the sworders of the Duke his head over the prisoner, he said, in a of Burgundy, and flying to seek and find kind and gentle tone,-'Do you remem- protection and concealment with his father's cousin, the Lord of Hannut. Such was the father should become a second parent to the ders, and the magistrates of Ghent, to say yourself with.

Such things are very strange,' said Albert Maurice; 'and if you knew all that I know, 'You shall find me ready,' replied Albert you would say so. Most strange, indeed!

He spoke mournfully, and then fell into a deep, long fit of thought, from which he was only roused by the young cavalier demanding, whether the noble Lord of Imbercourt had been saved, after all? What were the thoughts at that moment in the bosom of Albert Maurice-whether his mind rested painfully on the consciousness that he could no longer boast of a guiltless heart, and pondered, with all the bitter; wringing agony of crime, upon the blessed sweetness of innocence-can only be guessed; but an involuntary groan burst from the lips of the young citizen at the question of the prisoner, and he clasped his hand upon his eyes. Removing them an instant after, he replied, gazing somewhat sternly upon his companion,—' He died as he deserved.

Hugh of Gueldres replied not; but, feeble as he was, returned the stern glance of Albert Maurice, with one still more severe and reproachful. The young citizen recovered himself, however, at once, banished the frown from his brow, and for the moment even stifled the regret within his bosom. Let us not speak, my Lord,' he said, 'on matters of painful discussion. The man you asked for was tried and condemned by lawful judges, upon what they considered sufficient evidence. He suffered this morning according to his sentence. Suffice it, that I had no personal hand either in his doom or execution. Thank God for that! said Hugh de Mortmar; 'for I do believe that I should look upon even liberty as stained, if received from the hands of one who, for envy or ambition, could do two such noble men to death as died this day in Ghent."

The blood rushed violently up to the face and temples of Albert Maurice; and, for a moment, he felt so giddy, that he started up and leaned against the wall for support. What he had said was true, indeed, to the letter; but conscience told him, that he was not alone an accessory, but a principal in the death of Imbercourt; and, though he had spoken truth he nevertheless felt that he had deceived. There was again a bitter struggle in his bosom; but it was soon over, for the presence of another person shamed him station unacknowledged to the world. into conquering the upbraiding of his own heart.

son of him who made him childless. But let boldly that I think they have done nobly, your heart rest satisfied!' he added aloud; firmly, and well; and though I took no part your father is well and safe; and you have in the act itself, yet the opinion of no man not even an unconscious crime to reproach on earth will make me shrink from avowing that I would have done the same. But all this has nothing to do with the feelings between you and me. Suffice it, that I owe you a deep debt of gratitude, which I am ready and willing to pay. You shall be instantly removed from this dungeon to a more convenient chamber, where you shall be tended with all care, till such time as you have recovered strength. If you will, your existence and your situation shall be immediately communicated to the Duke of Gueldres. But still, I think—

'No, no,' answered the prisoner, quickly; 'no, no: if there be any other means whatever of obtaining my freedom, without revealing who I am, let me still remain concealed for a certain space. I know not well whether the news of my existence might, or might not, be well received. There are new plans and views abroad, I find, with which my appearance might interfere. My father, I hear, aims at the hand of the heiress of Burgundy.

A scornful smile curled the lip of Albert Maurice, while the other proceeded :- 'And I know not how he might love to hear, that a son he has believed to be dead for twenty years, had risen to cumber his inheritance. Let us pause for a time and see. Nor, indeed, would I willingly be found a prisoner.

'I think you judge rightly, my lord, plied the young citizen; 'though the Duke of Gueldres will never marry Mary of Burgundy. But, as to your freedom,' he added, cutting short something that the prisoner was about to reply, 'for that I will pledge my life; and when once more beyond the walls of Ghent, you can act as you will in regard to discovering yourself.

The motives of Hugh of Gueldres for wishing to conceal his existence from his father for some time longer, were certainly those which he had stated; but perhaps he might also be influenced by another feeling. mingling with men who knew him not for what he was, the name of his father had never reached his ears, but coupled with some opprobrious epithet, or in conjunction with some evil deed; and perhaps a lingering disinclination to claim kindred with such a man might make him still glad to leave his

Some farther conversation then ensued between the President of Ghent and the son of 'Let us say no more on that subject, my the Duke of Gueldres; and though Albert lord,' he rejoined, as soon as he had some- Maurice became often thoughtful and abwhat recovered his calmness. 'It is a matter stracted-though there was a varying and on which you and I cannot, I fear, agree. uncertain tone in everything he said, unlike I am bound, in justice to the states of Flan- his usual calm and dignified manner; yet, from the nature of the subjects to which they now both restricted themselves, there was something sweet and pleasing in the commune which they indulged. They spoke of the early days in which they had first met-of the times, and the scenes, and the pleasures, and the hopes of other years; and a kindly sympathy breathing from the past, made for them, even in the prison, and separate as they were by state, by station, by education, and by prejudices, a peculiar atmosphere in which they seemed to live alone. Hugh de Mortmar felt it strongly, and seemed to revive under its influence. His voice became firmer, and his eye regained its light.

'And what,' said Albert Maurice, after they had conversed some time on the scenes in the forest of Hannut,-'and what has become of that good stout soldier, Matthew my worthy uncle Martin Fruse?'

'He was with me, this day, in Ghent,' replied the prisoner; 'and I trust in God has escaped beyond the gates. Many a time also Fear not that he will meet you, and then take has he been the means by which I have com- counsel with him as you may think fit. municated to you, through your uncle, those proceedings which I thought it necessary that you should know. Once, not a month since, he was within the walls of Ghent; but could not obtain a private interview with you. Thus it was that you received tidings of the march of the base King of France. Thus, of the coming of his barber ambassador. Thus, too, did I send you a copy of that degraded slave's instructions.

'Then I owe you far more than I ever dreamed of,' replied the young citizen, 'and I will peril my life but I will repay it. Nevertheless,' he added, after a moment's thought, in which suspicions, vague indeed, but strong, of the motives and designs of the druggist Ganay, rose up before his mind; - 'nevertheless, although for the time I am powerful in the city, yet several days must elapse ere you can mount a horse. I have many enemies, too, many false friends, many dangerous rivals; and I would fain place your security beyond the chance of anything that may happen to myself. Think you, he added, musing, 'that Matthew Gournay, with twenty of his picked companions, would venture once more within the gates of Ghent, and, habited like followers of my own, be ready to aid in your deliverance, whether I be alive or dead?'

'If he have escaped,' replied the prisoner, 'he would come at my bidding, were it into the jaws of hell. But you must make me certain of his safety, Sir Citizen.'

'That he has escaped, rest assured,' replied Albert Maurice; 'for no one but yourself was taken: and as for his future security,' he added, with a smile, 'what object think you I could have in shortening an old man's days?

A bitter reply rose in the heart of the young cavalier, as he thought of the unhappy Lord of Imbercourt; but he felt it would be ungenerous to give it utterance, and he refrained.

'I trust you, sir!' he replied; 'I saved you at a moment when you were an oppressed and injured man; and to doubt you now in such a case would be a kind of blasphemy against the God who made the human heart. Take this ring, and send it by some sure messenger—a young boy, perchance, were best, though I do not think they would maltreat any one but an open enemy-but send it by some page in a small skiff down the Scheldt at two hours after dusk. The boat will undoubtedly be stopped-and let the page give the ring to Matthew Gournaywhom he will find in the woods between this and Heusden, if he escaped unhurt from Gournay, who was, in some sort, a friend of Ghent.—Let the boy add a message, bidding him, in my name, render himself, with twenty of his comrades, to the house of good Martin Fruse, at any hour that you may appoint.

Some more explanations ensued; but as Albert Maurice perceived that the prisoner was exhausted with so long a conversation, he soon after bade him farewell, and left him. 'For two days,' he said, as he turned to depart, 'in all probability, I shall not visit you; for it may be well not to excite any suspicion of my design. But you shall be watched carefully night and day, that no foul practice be employed against you; and at the end of the third day I trust to find you well enough to bear at least a short walk to the river side. In the meantime, as they have deprived you of your arms, for greater security take this.' And he placed in his hands a broad double-edged Venetian poniard, adding,-'Fear not to use it, should any one attempt to injure you; for if they do, the means they employ must be of that kind which does not court examination; and now,

once more, farewell!'

The young citizen then retired; and though the more kindly and noble feelings which his conversation with Hugh of Gueldres had awakened-feelings untainted by the world's ambition or its policy-could not, it is true, stifle entirely the cry of remorse; yet there had been a balm in it all, that sent him forth soothed and softened. He retired not to his chamber till he had given orders that care and attendance should be shown to the prisoner, and that he should be removed to a better chamber; but when, at length, he cast himself upon his bed, fatigue, and the feeling that his heart was not all bitterness, brought sleep, though it was disturbed; and he woke not till the dawn looked in, and roused him from slumber.

Already, when he rose, the first poignancy from the very deeds he so deeply regretted. ing on his heart, he rose prepared to forget ing power. the pang, in all the active energy of watchful policy and great ambition. many envious and suspicious visitors—feeling found and overbear them all. Strange to say painful irritation which he now suffered appeared to render all the faculties of his mind more acute and powerful. Naturally ener- collision with the eschevins of Ghent, and at getic, he had acquired a new degree of energy, from the necessity of withdrawing all his revenge being accomplished; but as it was thoughts from the past, and fixing them on far from the wish of Maillotin du Bac that the present or the future; and his compre- his prisoner should be examined before the hension of the most confused narrative States at all, he instantly determined to reseemed more clear, his orders to the most port him as much too ill to meet the proposed stupid messenger more precise, than ever they had appeared in the whole course of his public career.

An assembly of all the deputies from for that day; but during the morning a numnearly gratified revenge.

At another moment, Albert Maurice might have alone despised him, and crushed him of his judgment even on that point, because the beneath his feet as a mere worm; but he well course pursued by the young citizen was knew that great power often trips at a small almost always totally different from the obstacle. He felt, too, that the height he method which he himself would have folhad reached was a giddy one; and that it lowed in order to arrive at the same object, might require to stand some time on the and totally opposed to all the axioms of his dizzy pinnacle of power, in order to acquire own meaner policy. that firmness of footing which alone could of regret was gone; and the wound in his very elevation offended many; and, seeing heart had grown stiff and numb. The voice that the contention must soon commence of self-love was more ready to plead extenua- between himself and the Duke of Gueldres on tion; and hope, always far more potent than the one hand, and the Duke of Cleves on the memory, told him that mighty things might other, he determined to leave the way unyet be derived for love and for his country, encumbered by any minor difficulties. Not that he proposed for a moment to abandon At all events, policy whispered that he must his purpose towards the prisoner he had left not let the moments slip; and, though the the night before; but he resolved to free him immortal worm, remorse, was yet slowly prey- by quiet policy, more than by bold and sweep-

'Sir Prévôt,' he said, as soon as their first salutation had passed, 'you did wrong Even while he was dressing, messenger last night in placing a sentry within the walls after messenger, from different parts of the of the municipal prison; and also somewhat country, bearing news, not alone of the move- harshly, in confining an untried prisoner in ments of friends and enemies, but also of the one of the lower dungeons. Hear me, sir, to preparations which he himself had been an end, he added, seeing the other about to labouring to complete, was admitted to his make some dogged reply: 'I have no inten-After collecting the tidings that tion of bringing the matter of your boldness each one bore him, with a minute memory before the council, as I might have done; that never failed, and arranging every par- but the thing must not be repeated. Should ticular in his own mind with that methodical any like event arise again, I will take care accuracy which rendered the whole available the magistracy of Ghent shall examine strictly at a moment's notice, he descended early to what punishment is to be inflicted on those the hall-where he expected soon to meet who have frequently dared to infringe their privileges! Mark me, and remember! for I that he possessed a store of ready information will not pass it over a second time. Now, on every subject, which he knew must con- then, before the States assemble, take one of my officers and visit the prisoner. See -or, perhaps, not strange at all—the state of whether he is able to undergo examination to-day; and make me your report.'

The Prévôt was very glad to avoid any the same time to see a fair prospect of his investigation.

At the same time, there was something in the demeanour of the young citizen that sur-prised him. As men of shrewd but mean Flanders and Brabant had been appointed minds sometimes are, in their estimation of nobler characters, he was right in his general ber of persons crowded the great hall in a appreciation of Albert Maurice, and usually desultory manner, long before any general perceived the great object that the President meeting of the States took place; and amongst was likely to seek in any particular continthe first that appeared was Maillotin du Bac, gency, without, however, at all comprehending with an air which expressed both a knowledge the inferior means he would employ to actual that he had overstepped his authority, and a complish his purpose, So much the contrary, determination to resist every effort to curb his indeed, that after having judged rightly of the ultimate design, he would often become puzzled and doubtful in regard to the accuracy

Thus, in the present instance, he had justify him in despising inferior enemies. His sought the town-hall so early, under the perfect conviction that the President of Ghent would and the Lord of Ravestein was sent at once to given him his freedom; believing, at the burgher guard. same time, that the consciousness of such a own views. But the bold and proud manner a seat amongst the deliberative body, filled Hugonet and Imbercourt, would be followed senseless shout it despises, when once it has feeling than selfish ambition.

to confirm this opinion; and led him, how- members of the States assembled, rose to ever falsely, to believe that Albert Maurice speak; but at the moment that he did so, the generous tie and private affection, in the overpowering impulse of an aspiring heart. Gueldres! Health to the noble Duke of powering had the order proceeded from the the fair Princess! Long life to Ghent and lips of the young citizen to inspect the condition of the prisoner, ere two or three members from the square below; and the young citizen of the States entered the hall. Several others again sat down, with a contracted brow and followed within a very short interval; and as quivering lip. soon as Albert Maurice perceived that a In a few or sufficient number were assembled to justify entered the hall, and took his seat on the the discussion of important matters, he deright of the President, who knew the informal clared the appointed hour fully arrived, called constitution of their whole assembly too well, them to consultation, and at once boldly pro- to object to that noble's intrusion on their coun-

Maurice feared,—his motives will be clear gress of the French monarch. 'Of many enough. The Duke of Gueldres, though dandangers,' he said, 'it was of course necessary debate.

the instant removal of the Dowager Duchess every thought but patriotism, and calling attempt to liberate the man who had before the palace, enforced by a large body of the

Gradually the assembly increased, till about purpose would cause the aspiring citizen to forty persons were gathered round the council avoid the subject, or to speak darkly upon his table, while a number of others, unentitled to in which Albert Maurice rebuked his assumpt he vacant places of the hall, by the favour of tion of power in the town prison, and spoke the President's adherents. He himself was, of the immediate examination of the prisoner, perhaps, not unaware that a multitude of shook his conviction, and almost bade him voices, ready to applaud his views, were colbelieve that the same stern and uncomprolected around him; for the noblest,—ay, and mising policy, which had been pursued toward the proudest heart will bend servilely to the throughout, without regard to any other bound itself as a serf in the golden collar of ambition. Albert Maurice at length, after The scenes which he soon witnessed tended casting his eye around to see who were the posed that a decree of banishment,—drawn cils. Albert Maurice rose again immediately up in the name of the States General of Flanders, though not ten members of that body States, as they termed themselves, in a speech were present, and those wholly devoted to his full of fire and energy. He pointed out that own views—should be issued against the the time was now come, when active and Lord of Ravestein and the Dowager Duchess combined exertion throughout the whole land of Burgundy, as parties to the plot for sub- was necessary to save it from the usurpation or surgundy, as parties to the pior for subgicting the country to the sway of France.

In a few moments the Duke of Gueldres

So bold a measure was not, of course, without an object of deep moment to him who proposed it; but when it is remembered, that Ravestein and Margaret of York were the
the whole; and he touched eloquently upon only influential persons who now remained with the Princess, of what was called in Ghent influential persons who now remained with the Princess, of what was called in Ghent jealousies, disputes, and feuds, in order to the French Party,—the only party that Albert

Maurice feered—his motives will be clear orcess of the French monarch.

Of many gerous from the popularity he had suddenly to meet that which was most imminent, and acquired, the young citizen thought himself no one would doubt for a moment, that the strong enough to overthrow when he liked, usurping and successful arms of France presupported by the Duke of Cleves, and by the sented the peril they had most to dread. manifest abhorrence which the Princess dis- Severe measures had been pursued, he said, played towards that prince; and the Duke of 'to show the timid and the traitor that they Cleves himself, the president felt sure, was too could not betray their country with impunity; weak to succeed without his aid. Thus the and it became the States of Flanders and French alliance was the only proposal that he Brabant, even as a consequence of many of really dreaded; but still, the measure he their late acts, to prove to their countrymen counselled was too bold to pass without some that they could and would protect the honest and the patriotic, as well as punish the guilty It was carried, however, at length, before and the disloyal. It was time,' he added, 'to any one arrived who had sufficient influence lay aside all differences of opinion, to forget to oppose it with vigour; and the order for individual interests and passions, to cast away forth the whole intelligence and the whole strength of the state, to join heart and hand, and mind and energy, in defence of their violated rights and their insulted country.

He spoke with the most powerful oratory, and he spoke true: but he did not remember that the oil of smooth words will never allay the raging waves of faction, even though the storm of anarchy threaten to wreck the state itself. Had he looked into his own heart, indeed, and seen that, though he was now anxious to repel the common enemy, yet it was but in order to seize one quiet moment to overthrow his political rivals, he would have learned the secret of every bosom around him, and found that selfish ambition was the whole.

In the midst of his speech, however, while, in the very vehemence of declamation, he was inveighing against France, and was about to proceed from the general terms which he had been using, to a clear and minute view of the state of the land, and the measures immediately necessary for its defence, one of the deputies from some inferior town, who believed the moment for distinguishing his own small knowledge and talents was arrived, rose, and boldly cut across the President's speech, exclaiming, - Perhaps the noble President does not know the unhappy

'I know all!' thundered Albert Maurice, his eyes lightening with indignation at the interruption. 'God of Heaven! wherefore do I hold the station that I do, if it be not to learn, and know, and investigate, all that may concern the interest of the state? Do I not know that Arras has fallen? that Tournay is in the hands of the enemy? that Hesdin, and Boulogne, and Bethune are taken? that Oudard has been murdered? that Descordes know that the Duchy of Burgundy is invaded; that Franche-compté is overrun; and that the troops of Louis are advancing to the gates of Ghent? What is it that I do not know, that any one should dare to interrupt me? Let me tell the deputy who has just sat down, that, if he had all the miserable catalogue of the woes and dangers of his country, from the first infraction of her frontiers, to the last base, or mean, or murderous act of her great enemy, so much by heart as I have, he would turn every thought of his mind to find means of meeting the perils that menace us, rather than interrupt the order of this assembly by speaking before he has heard.

The vehemence with which the young citizen spoke, the picture of overwhelming misfortunes which he displayed, and the deep tone of patriotic anxiety which his words breathed forth, combined to make his hearers forget the angry bitterness with which he reand gazed, with an expression of terror, in the faces of the others, as the President counted over the rapid losses and misfortunes of their country.

Albert Maurice paused, and Ganay, who was present, remarked, without rising, 'Something must be immediately done to remedy all this. Or, doubtless,' he added, not unwilling to bring about some imputation of blame upon Albert Maurice for neglect, though unwilling to utter one word of blame himself, 'or, doubtless, our noble President has already, with his usual activity, prepared some means and as he did so, a slight curl of the lip con-

of meeting all these difficulties. 'I have!' replied Albert Maurice, sternly;

veyed to the druggist a suspicion that his purpose had been understood. 'I have! The difficulty can only be met, the enemy can only be opposed in arms, and the means have been prepared. Seven thousand men have been raised and trained in Ghent, as you all Three thousand men are ready to know. march in the villages round about. Before noon, five thousand more will be in the city from Ypres, and ere night, five thousand more will have arrived from Bruges; while Brabant and the other provinces are preparing an army of forty thousand men besides, Our power is thus already sufficient to keep the towns of Flanders against the King of France, while forces are marching up to our aid, which will soon enable us to expel him from our land for ever. Provisions for forty days have been prepared, and a magazine of arms is already established at Oudenarde, which is garrisoned by a sufficient force to ensure it from capture. We have still a line of fortified places, which we can soon render secure; and, having done so, we can bid the tyrant either retire from our borders, or let is false? that Vergy lies in chains? Do I not his soldiers rot in the field till we reap them with the sword, instead of that harvest which they have moved ere it was ripe.'

A loud and long burst of applause followed this recapitulation of the means which, by the most extraordinary activity, he had collected in so short a space of time to repel the arms of France; and, satisfied with the impression that he had made, Albert Maurice sat down, in order to allow one of the deputies from Ypres to propose a plan of action, which had been laid down between them before, for the employment of the forces thus raised to the general advantage of Flanders. The worthy burgher, however, though a man of sense, and some military skill, having served during a considerable time with the people of his commune under the Duke Philip, was always an unwilling speaker, and paused for a moment to collect his ideas after the President-had sat down.

The Duke of Gueldres instantly seized the buked one of their members, and each turned occasion, and, anxious to gain the command the suburbs of Tournay, together with five security of Flanders, and may also greatly hundred men-at-arms which he had raised tend to facilitate the very objects proposed by since his liberation. 'The very appearance the noble Duke of Gueldres. But the two of such a force in the field,' he said, 'and led plans are by no means incompatible. Neither on to some rapid and brilliant expedition, Lille nor Douai can admit of a garrison of would make Louis XI., who had been well more than two thousand men in addition to called Le Roi Couard, pause and hesitate, while fresh reinforcements might come up to Twelve or thirteen thousand men will be quite swell the army of Flanders, and enable it sufficient to enable the noble Duke to make either to risk a general battle, or attempt his attempt upon Tournay. Let then the the re-capture of the towns which had been President himself, whose military skill we all objected, and declared that, instead of en- or six years ago-let him then lead five thoucountering any further risk than that inevit- sand men to the aid of Lille and Douai; and, able in leading a raw and unexperienced army having thrown what force into those places he through a difficult country, they ought to may find necessary, return with the rest to make it their chief object to strengthen the Ghent; while, in the meantime, the Duke garrisons of all the many fortified towns they marches forth against Tournay with the rest still possessed, but more especially to throw a of the force which we can spare from the considerable force into Lille and Douai, which defence of this city. still held out for the Princess, and were plentifully supplied with provisions, but whose re- the mind of Albert Maurice were of a very spective garrisons were too small to retard the progress of Louis for three days, when-ever he should lead his armies against them. indications by which a skilful observer may In support of this opinion, he showed that read the changes of the human heart, the troops hastily levied, and unaccustomed to warfare, were much more likely to serve well no longer the zealous friend he had been, and when defended by stone walls, and commanded by experienced officers, than in the dark and subtle being there could be no open field against a veteran army. Heshowed, also, that Tournay itself was not likely long opposition, circumstanced as they were and to hold out for France, if Lille and Douai had been. With this conviction impressed were properly garrisoned with numbers suffi- upon his mind, perhaps he might see, or at impossible, but never to fancy anything easy.

opposed by a simple citizen of Ghent, and he dread the consequences of his own absence at was about to reply with hasty vehemence, a moment so critical. Nevertheless, one of which would infallibly have ruined all his own designs, had not Ganay started up, and, with all the smooth and plausible art of which he was master, sketched out a plan, which, while it seemed to coincide with that of Albert Maurice, rendered it nearly nugatory, and, at He felt, too, within himself, great powers of the Duke of Gueldres.

here present, that the preservation of Lille and long discussions ensued, in the course of

of the army, proposed to lead himself against and Douai is absolutely necessary for the witnessed when he served with the men of To this proposal Albert Maurice strongly Ghent under the late Duke Charles some five

The feelings which this speech excited in mixed and intricate nature. By this time, young burgher had learned that Ganay was he felt, rather than remarked, that with that medium between active support and deadly cient to sweep the whole neighbouring coun- least suspect, that one object in the proposal try of provisions; and he ended by calling of the druggist was to obtain his absence from upon the States not to be dazzled by the the city. He might see, too, that the comapparent ease of the enterprise proposed by mand of a large portion of the army given to the Duke of Gueldres, for he could assure the Duke of Gueldres, whose military abilities them that it was the best maxim, both in were well known, would throw immense power tactics and policy, never to believe anything into the hands of that prince, becoming already too powerful; and he likewise knew The countenance of the Duke of Gueldres the general dangers attendant upon the abflushed with wrath, to hear himself so boldly sence of a political leader too well, not to his chief weaknesses was the ambition of military renown; and that ambition had received an impulse which it had never known before, since he had dared to raise his hopes to a Princess descended from a race of heroes. the same time, coincided exactly with that of the kind immediately required, and he trusted that, by the exertion of that energetic activity 'The infinite wisdom and skill,' he said, which characterised all his movements, he which have been displayed, under all cir- should be enabled to accomplish his entercumstances, by our noble President, should prise-to add, perhaps, some brilliant exploits make us receive his opinion with reverence to all that he had already performed, and to and respect, were it not even evidently founded return to Ghent before any great advantage in knowledge and experience. There can be could be taken of his absence by his enemies. no doubt, however, in the minds of any one An immediate reply, however, was necessary, points to be determined, that much angry and vehement dispute took place, in which Duke of Gueldres more than once broke forth, and was repressed by the young citizen, in his capacity of President of the States, with a stern severity, that left them both, with flushed cheeks and frowning brows, gazing upon each other when the meeting of the States broke up. By this time, however, all was determined. Albert Maurice had accepted the command, with the understanding that it was totally distinct and independent of the one conferred upon the Duke of Gueldres, that the troops were solely under his own orders, and that the moment he had performed the specific task he undertook, he was at liberty to return to Ghent. All this had been conceded. The populace quitted the hall, and the deputies, one by one, took their leave and retired. The Duke of Gueldres was among the last that left the apartment, and it was with a slow step he descended the stairs nearly to the bottom, biting his lip with ill-repressed passion at the contradiction he had met with, and at the little reverence that the President of Ghent had shown either to his opinions or to his rank. His meditations did not serve to cool him; on the contrary, at every step the words which had been addressed to him, and the scene in which they had been spoken, recurred with more and more bitterness to his mind, and when he had reached the last step but two, passion, as it often did with him, got the better of all command, and stamping on the ground with his foot, as he remembered the contemptuous curl of the young citizen's lip, he turned, and mounting the stairs with wide strides, once more entered

Albert Maurice was standing alone at the head of the table, with a countenance of deep melancholy, from which every expression of anger and scorn was now totally banished. He raised his eyes as the Duke entered, and gazed upon him with surprise, as advancing close to him, with flashing eyes and a burning cheek, that rude prince exclaimed, 'You have dared, sir-villain and slave as you are, base mechanical hind, bred and born amongst looms and shuttles-you have dared to treat with disrespect a noble of the land; and, by heaven, you shall some day pay for it. Were you not as the dirt beneath my feet, and would not your vile blood sully my sword to shed it, I would save the hangman the pains he may some day have, and punish you where

'Know, Duke of Gueldres,' replied Albert Maurice, with calm sternness,—though in which Albert Maurice did not absolutely temperate insolence of his adversary, - 'Know, oppose the scheme of Ganay; yet there were Duke of Gueldres, that were there anything in the details so many nice and delicate in the empty assumption of blood, mine is descended from as pure a stock as your own, though one of my ancestors wisely and nobly the violent and overbearing temper of the chose to embrace an honourable trade, rather than follow the example of such as you and yours, and live by rapine, plunder, oppression, and wrong. Advance not your hand towards me, Sir Duke, for remember that insult levels all distinctions: and that I, too, wear a sword, which I should not scruple to dye in nobler blood than that of the Duke of Gueldres, if he laid but a finger upon me.

'Out, slave!' cried the Duke; 'I will take thy boasted descent on credit, were it but to punish thine insolence;' and striking the young citizen a violent blow on the breast, he threw back his mantle, and drew his sword.

Albert Maurice was not slack to meet him, and his sword was also in his hand, when a number of the citizens who had heard, through the open doors, the high words which had lately passed, ran in and beat up their wea-The Duke of Gueldres glared round him for a moment in vain fury, then thrust back his sword into its scabbard, and shaking his clenched hand towards the young citizen, exclaimed, 'When next we meet!' and, turning on his heel, left the apartment.

Albert Maurice sheathed his weapon also. and only commenting on what had passed by a contemptuous smile, resumed his look of grave thought, and proceeded calmly to transact the business of his station.

CHAPTER XXXII,

THE PRINCESS AND THE PRESIDENT.

THE Duke of Gueldres, however, was still to enjoy a triumph before he returned to his dwelling, which, could he have seen into the heart of his rival, would have fully compensated all the pain which his anger had inflicted on himself. Albert Maurice was left alone: but there was a shout in the market-place without, which rang painfully on his ears, as he turned from the great hall; for he could not avoid hearing the loud voice of the multitude, cheering the Duke of Gueldres as he mounted his horse. The sounds were distinct enough; and bitter enough, also! They were 'Long live the Duke of Gueldres and the Princess! Gueldres and Burgundy for ever! We will give her to whom we like! She shall marry the good Duke! Long life to the noble Duke of Gueldres!' and though, as that prince rode on, the words were no longer to be distinguished, the cries still continued, and other days he might have laughed at the in- the fancy of the young citizen furnished each character most inimical to his own peace.

'Ere I go,' he thought, - 'ere I go, I will see her myself; and assure myself of her feelings before I quit the city. Then, if I find that she hates him, as I believe-that she looks upon him as the wolf he really is, I will take sufficient means to guard her from his importunities during my absence.

The determination was no sooner formed than he prepared to execute it; and while he despatched a messenger to the palace to to his departure, which was fixed for the next day, he gave a multitude of necessary orders, and as soon as his horse was ready, ment of her friends, made him dread even while he courted it.

But, as those who are young in deceit generally do, he forgot, for the time, that the dark secrets of his heart were confined to his own bosom; and that the policy he had pursued, and the bold ambition that prompted it, were unknown to her who had most suffered by it. In truth, the feelings of Mary were very different from those which he had anticipated. The broad and simple facts only had reached her ear. She knew that the young citizen had taken no part in the trial or the judgment of Imbercourt, and that he had not even been present at his execution. The order for the immediate removal of the Duchess Dowager and Ravestein, also, had been issued in the name of the States : and perfectly unconscious of the wild hopes and ambitious dreams of Albert Maurice, she believed that if he had at all mingled in those proceedings, it was but most unwillingly, and from a strong though mistaken impression of duty and patriotism. Deprived, too, of the counsellors in whom she had always most trusted, and of the friends whom she had treat her with kindness and tenderness; and had always seemed to advocate her interest; painful policy her ministers had dictated. racter, and the apparent disinterestedness of all intrusion. his conduct, had gained her esteem; and the respectful gentleness of his manners towards herself, as well as his constant and zealous base, that dreadful Duke of Gueldres. Even advocacy, in the council, of the line of policy the shelter of my own apartments is no security brawling shout with articulate words of the dictated by her wishes as a woman, had won her gratitude and her confidence.

A gleam of pleasure brightened the gloom around her when she heard that he was coming; and, in order at once to attach him more strongly to her interests, to express her thanks for his supposed services, and to detach him totally from the burgher faction, whose influence had already worked so much evil, she directed one of the officers of the palace to draw up, immediately, letters of nobility in favour of the young citizen, and to demand an audience of the Princess previous bring them to her with all speed. Gentle by nature and by habit, the only arms which Mary ever employed against her rebellious subjects were favours and mildness, and she set out himself to seek an interview, which the fondly fancied, that, in this step towards consciousness of having brought about the Albert Maurice, she had devised a deep death of Mary's counsellors, and the banish- stroke of policy. The secretary's task was almost completed when Albert Maurice arrived; and the evident pleasure with which Mary received him, in the midst of all her griefs, extinguished for the time remorse and apprehension in the blaze of hope and joy, and once more nerved him for the bold career of ambition in which he had started against such fearful odds.

The Princess was pale and shaken with all the agitation, terror, and grief of the day before; but the light that shone up in her eyes, and the smile which played about her lips as he approached, made her appear a thousand times more lovely in the eyes of the young burgher than she would have seemed in all the pride of state, security, and happiness. In the unconscious simplicity of her heart, too, all her words gave encouragement to feelings that she little dreamed of; and when, on the announcement of his approaching departure, she pressed him to stay, and to abandon his design; when she assured him that he was the only one in whom she could now trust, since her faithful servants had been put to death and her kindred had been banished, and beseeched him not to most loved, the unhappy girl felt inclined to leave her without a counsellor, or without a cling to any one who seemed disposed to friend, Albert Maurice, knowing the passions that animated his own bosom, could not but the only one who now remained was Albert hope that in some degree she saw them too; Maurice. He had always been gentle; he and-while habitual respect cast a deep reverence over all his words and actions, he had never asked her for gift, or honour, or which served to deceive her as to his feelings, dignity; and even his very animosity towards -his love and his ambition caught a new fire Imbercourt and the chancellor had first arisen from the confiding esteem she expressed in the support which he gave to the Princess towards him. He assured her that in six in her reluctant struggles against the hard and days he would be once more in Ghent; and he hoped, he said, to lay some laurels at her The dignity of his demeanour, the high qualifeet. In the meantime, he added, it might ties of his mind, the independence of his cha- be necessary to think of her security against people, they tell me, is becoming fearfully character of her who spoke, and what she had great. Speak, Margaret, she added, turning before said on the same subject; and he saw to one of her attendants, 'what was it you that she deceived herself in regard to the part heard the people crying but now?'

Maurice, without waiting to hear from the Princess's lady a repetition of words which had already made his blood boil. 'Fear not, your Grace! The career of the Duke of rightly, his own ambition will be a stumblingblock sufficient to bring his speedy overthrow. But if not—sooner than you should suffer from his insolent daring, he shall find that Albert Maurice does not wear a sword in

'Oh, use it not against him, sir,' replied the Princess; 'there may be other ways of ridding the city of his presence. Too much blood has been shed already; nay, do not look sad, Lord President. I know that it was without your will. I know that you were not even present. But while you are absent from the city,—if your absence be unavoidable,— I beseech you to take measures to guard me and degrading path of policy. against his intrusion. When you return,' she added, with a deep crimson blush, which rose parations for his departure early the next from feelings that would have damned all the young citizen's presumptuous hopes for ever, could he have divined them; 'when you return, I would fain speak with you, on taking such measures for the defence of the state as may obtain for it permanent security. woman's hand, I see, cannot hold the reins of such a land as that, which I am unhappily called to govern; and it is time for me to after. We will not speak more now.' in the letters-patent, which he had been sence.

drawing up in haste.

whom they were destined with her own hand, leaving him at liberty to make them public, as he should think fit: and while she gave them, she added her thanks for his obedience they met. Though the subject was too painful for the Princess even to mention the name against him; and his influence with the reflection called to his mind the simple, candid he had taken. There was a natural rectitude 'Fear not, your Grace,' replied Albert in his heart which might have made him, at any risk, avow boldly his approval of, if not his participation in, the bloodshed which had been committed-had the love of Mary of Burgundy not been at stake. But he who Gueldres draws towards its end! If I judge knew not what fear is, under other circumstances, had learned to become as timid as a child in her presence; and though, while kneeling to kiss her hand in thanks for the honour she had just conferred, his whole frame trembled both with the agitation of deep love, and the knowledge that he was acting a deceitful part, yet he found it impossible to utter those words which he well knew would have pronounced his own condemnation to the ears of Mary of Burgundy.

The sensation, however, oppressed him; and after hurried and somewhat incoherent thanks, he took his leave and retired, feeling that he had made another step in the crooked

The rest of the day was consumed in premorning, and in precautions against the influence of his enemies in Ghent. Men may make use of knaves and hypocrites, in order to rise, but they must still have recourse to the honest and the true, when they would give permanence to their authority. from the council which Albert Maurice now called to his aid, Ganay was excluded, as well as all the fiercer and more subtle spirits, yield them to some one who can better guide which had hitherto been so busy in the affairs the state than I can. But more of this here- of Ghent; while honest Martin Fruse, and seven other citizens like himself, who, though The heart of the young citizen throbbed as not without their weaknesses and their follies, if it would have burst, -but it throbbed with possessed at heart a fund of honesty of intent joy; and probably he might have replied, and plain common sense, were summoned by notwithstanding the prohibition of the Prin- the young citizen to a private conference, cess, in such a manner as would have ended for the purpose of taking such measures as the delusion of both; but, at that moment, would secure the peace and tranquillity of according to the orders he had received, the the city, and the stability of the order of secretary of the chancery of Burgundy brought things established, during his temporary ab-

He felt it difficult, indeed, to explain to The Princess presented them to him for them all the evils that were to be guarded against, all the dangers that he foresaw, and all the apprehensions that he entertained, or to preserve them unemployed till such time especially in regard to the druggist Ganay. To have done so fully, would have been to have exposed all the darker, and more to the wishes she had expressed when last dangerous secrets of his own bosom, and to have given a picture of himself, of the means he had employed, and of the deeds into of the two faithful servants she had lost, yet which he had been betrayed, which he was Albert Maurice felt that she alluded to her unwilling to display to any human being: petitions in their behalf. For a single instant and it was not without much circumlocuhe thought she spoke in irony, and his cheek tion that he could find words to convey his turned red and pale by turns; but a moment's immediate views to the honest men by whom he wassurrounded, and yet keep to those

Martin Fruse, however, whose love for his nephew was paramount in his bosom, greatly relieved the task; for—with a sort of intuitive feeling, that there were many things which Albert Maurice would wish to keep concealed, and from a desire of sparing him as much as possible—he passed as rapidly as his intellect would permit him to conclusions, skipping as quickly as possible over all explanations regarding preceding facts, with a nod or smile of intelligence, which led the other worthy merchants to believe that he was fully acquainted with all the machinery of the events which had taken place. After some hours' consultation, it was arranged that Albert Maurice, deputing his whole municipal authority to his uncle, should entrust the worthy citizen and the other merchants pre-sent, to form such a party in the council, as might keep the whole affairs of the town, if possible, in a completely passive state during for the world; and, withdrawing again with his absence. His office in the States General a noiseless step, he retired to his own chambe could not, of course, transfer; for though ber, and cast himself down upon his bed, to privilege connected with its assembling in sleep, which was all the repose that he was the city of which he had been constituted ever more to know on earth. chief magistrate, yet that privilege could not be deputed to another; and the States-if they met at all during his absence-would be presided over by the next deputy from the city of Ghent.

The power, however, which he placed in the hands of good Martin Fruse was anything but insignificant, for Ghent then ruled the States; and it was determined that all measures were to be taken for the security of the city and the repairs of the fortifications, that the purchase of supplies and provisions and the levying of men were to go on as usual; but upon the proposal of any important movement, on the part of Ghent, a motion for its postponement till the return of the President was immediately to be put, and suppor-General, too, was to be opposed as much as possible during his absence from Ghent; Ghent was, of course, paramount in their own city, it seemed probable that his friends would be able to exert great influence in this respect. Any pretensions of the Duke of Gueldres to the hand of the Princess were to be strenuously opposed in the council; and Martin Fruse, with the burgher guard, were to give her every support and protection, in case she might require it. Anxious, too, for the safety of Hugh of Gueldres, Albert Maurice safety of Hugh of Gueldres, Albert Maurice which artful men often possess,—he did not took care that a strong guard should be stationed over the prison, and that the merchants struggle with that of any other being; yet should be prepared to put an instant negative upon any proposal for bringing the prisoknowledge of foregone facts which Albert ner to trial during his absence,

When all these arrangements were congeneral terms which might not expose himself. cluded, the next care of the young citizen was to select such bands from amongst both the new and old levies of the city, as were most likely to ensure him success in the enterprises which he proposed; and this being done, and all his further preparations completed, he proceeded, once more, to visit the Vert Gallant of Hannut in the chamber to which he had now been removed. The young cavalier lay in a deep, sweet sleep, from which even the opening of the door, and the approach of Albert Maurice did not wake him; and the young citizen gazed for a mo-ment or two on his face,—as he lay so calm and tranquil, within the walls of a prison, and exposed to constant danger-with a feeling of envy and regret, which, perhaps, few can appreciate fully, who have not felt the sharp tooth of remorse begin its sleepless gnawing on the heart

He would not have disturbed such slumbers

CHAPTER XXXIII.

A TREACHEROUS MURDER.

THE clang of trumpets echoing through the streets of Ghent, an hour before day-break, announced that the body of forces under the command of the young President was about to set out upon its expedition; and as the burghers started from their sleep, and listened to the various sounds that followed the trampling of horses, the voices of the officers, and the dull measured tread of marching men,-there was not unfrequently ted by his friends. The meeting of the States a feeling of pride rose in their bosoms from that universal principle- the extension of the idea of self!' as each one felt; that the and as the authority of the municipality of army thus on its march was, in some degree, his own, as part and parcel of the city of Ghent.

To the ears of none in the whole town, however, did those sounds come more pleasantly than to those of the druggist Ganay, who had felt, within the last two days, a sort of thirst to see the back of him he had once loved, turned upon the city; for, though—with that degree of pride in his cunning, Maurice had displayed, that made him entertain a vague fear of the young citizen, and rendered him unwilling to venture any very bold stroke till Ghent was free from his presence.

wounded Lord of Neufchâtel, into whose sick chamber he had obtruded himself with mind them—never mind them. The first sound of the trumpet fell upon sented by the noble's attendants, had he not fain sleep now, if the accursed itching of this by quiet and soothing attentions rendered himself useful, and his presence pleasing to boy with his rote, good Ganay! he often the invalid himself, while a long attendance puts me to sleep by playing on his instruhimself useful, and his presence pleasing to on a sick and fretful old man had cooled and ment-or the man that tells stories : he is in his service. A restless and feverish night soon as he begins, and to snore before he has had passed away; and as morning came, the ancient Seneschal of Burgundy showed some inclination to fall asleep; but the first answered the druggist. 'Mind you not how braying of the trumpets roused him, and he it refreshed you yesterday morning?' eagerly demanded what those sounds meant. 'Surely!' cried the old lord, in a peevish The druggist explained the cause at once; tone. 'Have you any more? Why did you horse sounded again, without being able to alone eases me?' raise a limb from his couch.

"Twas not so when first you knew me, Master Ganay?' he said; and then-while one sound succeeded another, and squadron the invalid, impatiently. 'When would you after squadron marched forth through the give a man medicine but when he is ill and streets—he continued to murmur a number of in pain? Spare not, man,—let the dose be low and somewhat incoherent sentences, be- full. Thou shalt be well paid for thy drugs. tween the delirium of feverish irritation and former stillness.

himself to sleep again, but Ganay now re- garded him. called his mind to the subject of his brighter said, returning to the topic of their early ac- faint taste as of earth. It is-it is-not quaintance; when first I saw your lordship, you would little have suffered an army to march, while you lay still in bed!'

'Not I-not I, indeed!' replied the Lord of Neufchâtel. 'But what can one do?'

'Alack, nothing now,' answered the druggist; 'but think that you never flinched -ay! and somewhat hasty withal.'

'Ah! my good Ganay, are you there now?' said the old lord, 'Have you not forgot that yet? Well, man, I did you wrong; but have I not tried to make atonement? I did you wrong, I do believe from my soul.'

'Believe, my lord!' cried Ganay; 'are you not sure? Are not the very papers you possess convincing enough of my innocence?'

old man, somewhat impatiently.

'Perhaps they are!' exclaimed the other. 'Nay, surely they are. But let me fetch and read them to your lordship-where can I find thrust in my shoulder would let me. Call the wearied those who were at first most active better still. I never fail to grow drowsy as half done.'

'Take but a cup of this elixir, my lord,' and the enfeebled warrior shook his head with not give it me sooner? How could you see me a melancholy air, as he heard the call to suffer so all night, and not give me that which

'Because, if used too often, it loses its effect,' replied the druggist.

'Give it me-give it me now, then,' cried

Ganay took up a cup from the table, and the drowsiness of exhaustion. At length as nearly filled it with a dark-coloured liquid a faint bluish light began to gleam into the from a phial which he drew out of his bosom. chamber from the dawning of the morning, He then gave it to the old noble, who drank the last horseman passed before the gates of off the contents at once, while the druggist the court-yard, and all in Ghent resumed its gazed on him with an eye which seemed almost starting from its socket, so intense was The old man would then have addressed the look of eager interest with which he re-

'Are you sure it is the same?' said the days, with an extraordinary degree of per- Lord of Neufchâtel, returning the cup,- it tinacity. 'Nay, nay, my noble lord,' he tastes differently; -it is bitterer, and has a

'But, as he spoke, the lids of his eyes fell -he opened them drowsily once or twiceadded a few more almost inarticulate words, and then sunk back upon his pillow. Ganay looked at him intently for two or three minutes. then stole out of the room; and, descending while you could keep the saddle. You were with a quiet step to the hall, he woke his own Ms eager a rider in those days as ever I met serving-boy, who was sitting by the fire. - 'Hie thee to the Prévôt,' he whispered; 'bid him hither instantly!'

'Who goes there?' cried the servant on watch, who had been asleep also, but was now wakened by the boy opening the door, - 'Who goes there?'

'Only my boy,' answered Ganay, 'going for some drugs against my good lord wakes,—I would have healed him sooner 'Well, well, perhaps they are,' replied the than all the leeches in the town, had I but tried it before; but, of course, I could not meddle till he dismissed the surgeon in such and kindness had been wearied, and attention manded the man.

'Better, I hope!' replied the druggist, out he has had a fearful night. He now sleeps, and I think it is a crisis. If he wake leeches, as soon as he heard the voice of Mailbetter, he will do well. If not, he dies.'

'God forefend!' cried the man.

once more to the sick man's chamber.

by a long, deep-drawn sigh; and Ganay add- a question or two. You, Master Ganay, being ing, 'He has had enough;' sat down, and one of the magistrates of the town, had better turning his face from the lamp, continued come with me, to bear witness that I seal all gazing for some minutes upon the couch. things fairly. You, my good lieutenant, bring few muttered words would escape his lips; return to the hall, to guard these worthy feland often he would turn and listen for the lows till I come.' sounds in the street, as if impatient for the coming of some one from without.

ing that his victim was awaking from his to the druggist with a well satisfied smile, but But he instantly perceived that without farther comment. what he saw was but the sign of a longer and more profound sleep having taken the papers are in the Venice cabinet, in the little old man to repose for ever; and, after one more glance to satisfy himself that no means of resuscitation could prove available, he man! replied the Prévôt; 'there is plenty of loudly called upon the servants and attend-time. Let us do things orderly. You seek ants to give him help, for that their lord was for the keys in the meantime. They are in dying. It was some time before he made them that cupboard, probably. Where is the key hear; for the illness of the old noble, as we of it? But never mind, -I will put back the have before said, had been long and tedious, lock with my dagger.

worn out. When they did come, therefore, 'How goes he now, Master Ganay?' de- the druggist had some excuse to rate them severely for inattention and sloth. He affected to try many means of recalling the dead to life again, and proposed to send for skilful

That officer now came boldly in, and, stop-Ganay echoed loudly the wish, and retired ping all other proceedings, demanded whether any relation of the dead lord were in the Entering with stealthy steps, he approached house. The answer, as he knew it must be, the bed, and gazed upon him that it con- was in the negative; for—as the servants retained. A slight stream of dark fluid had plied-all his connections were in the far parts fained. A signt stream of dark fluid had pheed—all his connections were in the lar parts flowed from his mouth, and stained his pil- of Burgundy. 'Well, then,' cried the Prévôt, low; and Ganay, as he remarked this appear—'it becomes me, though not exactly the ance, muttered, 'The stomach has rejected proper officer, to seal up all the doors and it! He must take more. To leave it half effects of the deceased, till such time as acdone, were worse than all! Here, my Lord,' count can be taken. You, my men,' he conhe added aloud, shaking him by the arm- tinued, to the archers of the band that fol-'Here! take a little more of the same blessed lowed him, 'gather all these worthy servants and varlets together in the great hall, and see But the old man made no answer, except that no one stirs a step, till I have asked them From time to time, as he sat and looked, a me some wax and a chafing dish, and then

The domestic attendants of the old lord. amongst whom were several of his ancient 'The Venice cabinet!' he muttered, 'that military retainers, grumbled not a little at this stands in the small arras chamber by the sa- arrangement, and might have shown someloon !- Could one reach it now, unperceived? what more stubborn resistance, had not the But no. 'Tis better to wait till Du Bac arrives force brought by the Prévôt overmatched them -Some of the varlets might catch me, and all in numbers as well as in preparations. One were ruined-Better wait till he comes-He of them, however, whispered to a boy who is very tedious, though-It works but slowly! was amongst them, to slip out and warn the He has had hardly enough—What can be other retainers in the lodging over the way; done? He cannot take any more!—That is the house, or rather houses, of the deceased a long drawn sigh, -it should be the last-A noble, extending, as was not uncommon in little help were not amiss, though !' and so those times, to both sides of the street. With saying, he pressed his hand heavily on the this intimation to the boy, and one or two chest of the old Lord of Neufchâtel! It rose loud oaths, which the Prévôt would not hear once slightly against the weight; but death the servants were removed, and the two acand life were by this time so nearly balanced complices stood together in the dead man's in his frame, that it rose but once, and then chamber alone. Such sights were too familiar all was quiet. Still Ganay continued the to Maillotin du Bac, to cause even the pressure with his whole force, till suddenly slightest feeling of awe to cross his bosom, as the eyes opened, and the jaw dropped; and he gazed on the face of the corpse; and after the murderer instinctively started back, fancy-looking at it for a moment in silence, he turned

> 'Let us make haste!' cried Ganay,-'the arras chamber by the saloon.

> 'Wait for the wax! Wait for the wax.

door exposed, as the Prévôt had expected, lying far back in the cabinet. Prévôt dipped his hand zealously into the Maurice. heart of the leathern bag, -drawing it forth,

An approaching step now caused him to you here, Sir President! I thought you were replace it hastily, and close the door; and, as miles hence by this time.' soon as the lieutenant brought him the wax and chafing dish he had been despatched to rice; 'doubtless you did! What do you seek, Maillotin du Bac proceeded to secure here?' that cupboard first, using the hilt of his dagger as a seal.

panion, saying, 'Now to the Venice cabinet, he recognised none of his own band. if you will. You know the way better than I -lead on.'

been the great saloon of the hotel. ported from Venice.

applied it to the keyhole. was already open, and that the whole shelves deceased.' which it contained, were covered with will take an age to go through.

events, make haste!'

are tied up in a bundle together, with my nation and surprise. name on the back.'

busily in his search; and at length the drug- and returned them to him; and Albert Mau-

This was soon accomplished, and the open gist himself caught a sight of the papers, several large bunches of keys, and a leathern are! Here they are!' he cried; but at that pag, which bore all the marks of being swelled moment—as he was reaching forth his hand out with coined pieces of some kind. The to seize them-a powerful grasp was laid upon druggist seized upon the keys, and carefully his shoulder, and turning round with a sudden concealed them on his person; but the start, he beheld the countenance of Albert

Without giving him time to meditate, the and then plunging it deep into his own bosom, young citizen drew him forcibly back from without at all examining what his fist con- the cabinet with his right hand, whilst he tained. After two or three such dives down himself laid his left upon the very bundle of into the pouch, which grew somewhat lank papers that Ganay had been about to take. and wrinkled under its intercourse with the The druggist was struck dumb with surprise, Prévôt's hand, he raised it, as if to see how disappointment, and consternation; but Mailmuch it still contained, murmuring, 'We must lotin du Bac, who did not easily lose his presence of mind, exclaimed at once, 'What!

'Doubtless you did,' replied Albert Mau-

'We seek to discover if there be any testamentary paper,' replied the Prévôt, who per-The inferior officer was soon sent away; ceived that the doorway, which opened into and the Prévôt instantly turned to his com- the saloon, was full of people, amongst whom

'And what right have you, sir, to seek for such papers?' demanded the President. 'Is 'This way, then! this way!' answered the it a part of your office? Is it a part of your druggist, 'we will go by the back passage;' duty? You seem to consider your functions and opening another door, he led on through wonderfully enlarged of late! Advance, several corridors, till they entered what had Maitre Pierre,' he continued, turning to one They of the eschevins of the city, who had accompaused not to feel, and still less to comment panied him thither. 'You will do your duty on the gloomy aspect which association gives in sealing up the effects of the Lord of Neufto a festive chamber, the lord of which is just châtel. As for those papers which I hold in gone down to the gloomy dust: but hurry- my hand, I hold them to be necessary to the ing on as fast as possible, they entered a small state, having seen them before, by the conroom beyond, which was hung all round with sent of the Lord of Neufchâtel, while awaitrich arras tapestry, and which, besides some ing in this chamber of his house an examinasettles and a table, contained a large black tion before the council of the Princess on a cabinet of the kind which was at that time im- charge brought against me by yon Prévôt. It is my intention, therefore, to keep them in my The druggist approached it eagerly, and, possession. But I beseech you, in the first looking at the lock, and then at the keys in instance, to envelope them carefully, sealing his hand, after some difficulty chose one, and them with your own seal, after which I will be What was his answerable for them to whatever person may surprise, however, to find that the cabinet prove to be the legal heir of the nobleman

Ganay's face, always pale, became perfectly books and papers, in a state of terrible con- cadaverous, as he heard these words; and both Albert Maurice and the Prévôt believed 'Curses on the old sloven!' he cried; 'this that the only feeling at his heart, at that lll take an age to go through.' moment, was terror. The words he muttered 'Better take all the papers,' said the Pré- to himself, however, were-'Fool! he has vôt, 'and leave the trash of books; but at all destroyed himself!'-and might have shown, had they been overheard, that the predomi-'I cannot conceal them all,' replied the nant passion of his soul-revenge-was still druggist. Here! help me to search. They uppermost; and even overbore both conster-

The eschevin, according to the desire of the The Prevot approached, and aided Ganay President, sealed up the papers in an envelope, rice, whose stern eye had turned severely the Prévôt's guard to quit the place. from the countenance of the one culprit to then at once proceeded to the chamber of the other, with an expression which made the dead man, and after a hasty examination them at first believe that he meditated to of the corpse, which excited still stronger exert his authority for their punishment, now suspicion, he led the way silently to the room once more addressed the magistrate, saying, in which he knew that the papers referring to 'I must myself leave you, sir, to pursue this Ganay were usually kept. business alone, for it will require hard riding to overtake the troops; but I have every con- without pursuing any further the events which fidence that you will examine this suspicious took place in Ghent, we shall beg leave to affair most strictly and carefully. You know follow the young citizen on his journey. how far, according to the laws, such conduct as we have seen to-day is just or unjust, and you will take measures, without favour, to see that justice be not evaded. But you will be pleased especially to cause the body of the deceased nobleman, of which we had but a casual glance just now, to be carefully examined by competent persons, in order to ascer- THE transactions of the next few days, though meet again. In the meantime, farewell.'

prevented, by some casual business, from Arras to cut off his retreat. setting out himself at the hour he at first proposed, but in order that the troops might not in blowing up the buble of popularity, he be delayed, he suffered them to begin their despatched messenger after messenger to march from Ghent, under their inferior officers, Ghent, bearing tidings of each event as it well knowing that, with the number of swift occurred. Joy and gratulation spread through horses he had at his command, he could overthee the city; and the people of Ghent, elated by take them before they had advanced many their novel exploits in arms, laid out in fancy miles. His way lay past the hotel of the Lord vast plans of conquest and aggrandisement, of Neufchâtel; and as he was riding hastily and began to think themselves invincible in on with a few attendants, he saw a boy drop the field. Nor was his military success withfrom one of the casements, and run across the out effect upon the heart of Albert Maurice street in breathless haste. From some vague himself. It did not, it is true, produce such suspicion, Albert Maurice stopped him, with over-weening expectations in his own bosom inquiries; and the boy at once replied, 'The as it did in those of his weaker fellow-citizens. old lord is dead, and the Prévôt and the But it certainly did give him new confidence druggist have shut all the varlets up in the in his own powers, from the very fact of findhall, while they seal up the papers. So they ing good fortune attend him in every effort, sent me to tell the squires and men-at-arms in however new and unfamiliar to his habits and the other lodging.

ledge that he possessed, was quite sufficient bination of constant occupation and repeated for Albert Maurice; and, sending instantly triumph drowned, for the time, those feelings for one of the eschevins who lived close by, he of remorse and self-upbraiding, which, day proceeded at once to the hotel, and with his by day, had been acquiring a stronger hold own followers, the retainers he found on the upon his heart. Besides, it communicated premises, and those who rapidly came over to his mind the refreshing consciousness of from the other side of the street, he obliged being energetically employed in the execution

All that ensued we have already seen, and,

CHAPTER XXXIV.

DEATH AND CONFESSION.

tain the cause of his death. My speedy return certainly comprising matters of great interest will prevent the necessity of your employing to many of the persons connected with the any means but those of precaution, till we present history, must be passed over as briefly as possible, because their nature is in a certain Thus saying, Albert Maurice, without taking sense discordant with the general tenor of the any further notice either of Ganay or the story. This is no tale of battles; unless it be Prévôt, quitted the chamber; and, leaving a the battle of passions in the human heart; sufficient number of persons behind to enforce and therefore it is that we give no minute the authority of the eschevin, he proceeded to detail of the incidents which befell Albert the courtyard, and, mounting his horse, gal-loped off. Maurice in his short but brilliant military career. Suffice it to say, that, by happy com-Things that appear very extraordinary in binations and the strenuous exertion of the themselves, are often brought about by the great activity which was one of the most consimplest means; and such had been the case spicuous traits in his character, he had, in the in regard to the interruption which Ganay short space of five days, thrown forces into and the Prévôt had met with in the execution Douai and Lille, and had defeated Le Lude of their design. Albert Maurice had been and a body of men-at-arms despatched from

Well aware of the mighty effect of success his mind, It nerved him to dare all, and to Such tidings, joined to the previous know- struggle against every difficulty; and the comof duties totally unmingled with any baser place was hidden itself by some wavy ground purer glory and gaining a nobler name, than his road onward towards Ghent. faction or intrigue-whatever might be its object, and whatever might be its resultcould ever obtain for man; and his heart ex- the place where they then were, the high road panded with a joy long unknown, when at from Tournay to Oudenarde; and, passing night he summed up the events of the day, among some woody grounds, it lay very much and found that another sun had risen and set concealed from observation. As they came on deeds which he could dare all the world to near the open road, however, Albert Maurice scrutinise.

to Ghent was not the less felt; and as soon forth from the less exposed ground below. as ever he had accomplished the great purpose But ere he reached it, the sounds that he of his expedition, he commenced his march heard were sufficient to satisfy him that the rapidity as possible.

thousand horse, from the various reinforce- manded by the Duke of Gueldres was little ments he had thrown into the frontier towns; less disagreeable to him than that of encounbut, nevertheless, confident of his own powers, tering a superior body of the enemy, he now he took the way towards Ghent, by the neigh- halted his men, and rode slowly along the bourhood of Tournay, although various bands narrow border of copse which separated the detached from the garrison of that city were low grounds from the high road, in order to continually making excursions into the coun- ascertain who were his immediate neightry around. He fixed his quarters for the bours, and what was the direction they were night, after his first day's march homeward, taking. The trampling of horses, the jingling in a little village about three miles to the east of armour, laughter, merriment, and oaths, the wind; while, over all the rest of the sky, nated by a cross-cross, or cross of St. Andrew. the bright sunshine was pouring triumphantly, The young burgher paused for several and flashing upon the diamond drops that the minutes; and fixing his eye upon a break blade of grass.

through the by-roads and less direct paths did not amount to more than five hundred had proceeded in this manner for about an strife, joined to the merriment that reigned lip, slight indeed, but bitter and contemptuous. the enemy. He rode on without comment, however; and motive in their origin, or any degrading that intervened—a long stream of thick, white means in their progress. In the actions smoke, drifting down the valley in which that which he performed during these four days, city stands. He drew in his horse for a mohe felt that for the first time he was really ment, and gazed upon the sight; and then, serving his country, that he was winning a putting his force into a quicker pace, pursued

The path which they were following entered, at about the distance of two miles from himself proceeded a little in advance of the Still the necessity of his immediate return line to reconnoitre, before he led his forces homewards, and pursued it with as much highway was occupied by some party of armed men, either friends or foes. As the His force was, by this time, reduced to a prospect of meeting with the forces comof that town; and, taking such precautions announced sufficiently the presence of some as were necessary to guard against surprise, military force; and the moment after, a break he passed the hours of darkness undisturbed. in the belt of wood showed him the rear of a It was a fine spring morning when he again body of horsemen passing on in a continuous put his troops in motion. The sun had just but somewhat irregular line towards Tournay; risen; and the fresh, elastic air, driving the while the straight crosses of cut cloth which vapours of the night before it, had gathered they wore sewed upon their gambesons, at together in the north a wide extent of dark once designated them as the adherents of clouds, streaked with the whiter mists that Francein opposition to Burgundy, the partizans were every moment carried to join them by of which Dukedom were as universally desig-

night had left behind on every spray and every some way farther down the road, watched till the spears and plumes began to pass by that The body of horse which the young citizen aperture also, and, by means of the two, commanded moved on quickly, but cautiously, easily ascertained that the party he beheld which led between Tournay and Ath; and it men. Though from various traces of recent hour, when the distant sound of a culverin, amongst them, he judged,—and judged followed by a heavy discharge of artillery, was rightly,—that the French were returning to borne upon his ear from the westward. The troopers listened eagerly, with no small curise osity written on their countenances; but the soity written on their countenances; but the face of Albert Maurice scarcely betrayed that own numbers, and his confidence in his own numbers. he heard the sounds, except by a curl of the powers, determined him immediately to attack

This resolution was no sooner formed than in a short time afterwards, as he led his force executed; and although the space was narrow over the summit of a small hill, he could per- for the evolutions of cavalry, the road having ceive, on looking towards Tournay-which on one side a large piece of marshy ground, and on the other a scattered wood; yet so tered over that part of the province. unprepared, were the French for the attack of knowing the state of the country, and deterthe Gandois, and so skilfully did the young mined, whatever were the case, to force his citizen employ a raw against a veteran force, way onward to Ghent without loss of time, he that the old soldiers of Louis at once gave way did not choose to detach any parties from his before the fresh levies of Ghent; and while main body; but he was of course very many a man found an ignoble death in the anxious for intelligence, and it was not long morass, those were the happiest who, by sharp spurring, made their way unscathed to for the purpose of determining his after pro-

heard in the morning, doubted not it had narde. been attempted on that very day, -he could not believe that so small a party as that which and the disgrace inflicted on his country, were he had just driven back within the walls, of course painful, as a whole, to the young would have ventured forth alone against the citizen; but there were parts of the detail superior force of the Gandois; and he felt which were not so unpleasant; for his sucsure that some larger body of French troops cesses of course stood out in brighter light must still lie between him and the retreating from their contrast with the failure of the army of the Duke of Gueldres.

tarnishing the gloss of his success by encounhad defeated the Duke of Gueldres was the tering a defeat at last, he caused the country very same that he himself had in turn overto be well reconnoitred as he advanced; and, thrown and driven into Tournay, the mortifiere long, the reported appearance of a large cation would be in some degree softened to force seen moving in the line of the high road, the people of Ghent, while he could not find about a league in advance, made him resolve in his heart to grieve very bitterly for their once more to take the paths through the wood defeated commander. to the east, however circuitous and incon-

was called. weapon cast away in flight-showed that a comfiture of its rear-guard. deadly strife must have passed not far from the ground over which he was marching, tained, the evening was too far advanced to These tokens of war, however, soon became make any farther movement; and Albert less frequent; and, by care and circumspec- Maurice, having taken measures to hold his tion, he passed on without encountering any present position in security, laid by the before he received as much as was necessary ceedings. Ere he had marched half a league. A battery of small cannon, which enfiladed the part of the road that led directly to the gate, protected the fugitives in their retreat; learned, that on that very morning the Duke and Albert Maurice, not fully aware of the of Gueldres had attacked and burned the state of the garrison, and the amount of forces suburbs of Tournay; but that in effecting his it could pour forth upon his small body, retreat, his rear guard had been charged by hastened to retreat from before the walls as a small force from the town, and had been soon as he found himself exposed to their nearly cut to pieces, notwithstanding extraartillery. The way seemed clear before him; ordinary efforts on the part of the Duke himyet-as he knew that the enterprise of the self. That Prince was reported to be dead Duke of Gueldres was to have taken place or taken, and the rest of the army had about that time, and from the firing he had retreated in no small confusion upon Oude-

This discomfiture of the Flemish forces, larger division; and as it appeared, by the Under these circumstances, and fearful of account of the fugitives, that the party which

The intelligence that he now received of the venient, being very well assured from his state of the garrison of Tournay—which it knowledge of the country and from his appeared was very scanty, but bold and enteracquaintance with the plans of the people of prising in the extreme-made him resolve to Ghent, that the line of operations of either halt for the night at the first village on the party could not have extended far to the east road, in order to keep the forces of that city of the Chemin d'Oudenarde, as the high road in check, while the dispersed parties of Flemings effected their retreat. He accord-He accordingly at once quitted the broad ingly took up his quarters at the little town causeway which led directly to Ghent, and of Frasne, on the edge of the wood, and passing across some of the wide yellow mus- immediately sent out parties to reconnoitre tard fields that lay to the right, he gained, the country, and bring in any stragglers they unobserved, the shelter of the scattered woods might meet with. But few were found, howthrough which he had been before advancing. ever; and from their information, the young As he marched on, however, the appearance burgher was led to suppose that the great of some of the fearful marks of warfare—now body of the forces, which had issued from a slain horse-now a long track of blood- Ghent two days before, had made good its now some piece of armour, or some offensive retreat, without any farther loss than the dis-

By the time these facts were perfectly ascerof the bands of either party which were scat- weighty armour with which, according to the custom of the day, he was encumbered on by the hands of the populace. He had himappeared before. Previous to the expedition abyss of anarchy and confusion. in which he was now engaged, the commune to be found no matter for self-reproach, more painful contemplations; and with no decided purpose of indulging that craving for return.

that they could never be doubted nor des- with it. troyed-and to accomplish all this by the

the march, and strolled out alone into the self brought about the death of two noblewood, to give way to thoughts which had long minded men, who, his own heart told him, were been sternly pressing for attention. He was innocent of the crimes with which they were now returning towards Ghent, where he could charged, and conscience thundered in his ear not hide from himself that new scenes of that they were murdered for his ambition. He intrigue, of anxiety, and of trouble, lay before could no longer look upon himself as a patriot. His previous conduct in the same He knew himself to have become solely an career had given birth to regrets which he had ambitious demagogue; and-look around him determined to scan, and try more accurately than on which side he would-he saw no means he ever yet had done; and from his judgment of extricating himself or his country from the on the past, to form a firm and inflexible de- state into which he had aided to immerse it, termination for the future. He found too but by pursuing the same dark and intricate that now was the moment when the self- intrigues—the mean cunning of which he felt examination must begin, if ever it was to be to be degrading to his better nature—by shedattempted; and many circumstances com- ding more blood, by stirring up more discord, bined to render it less painful than it had and by plunging deeper and deeper into the

While such a conviction forced itself upon with his own heart had offered so little but his mind, he almost shrunk from himself; and pure bitterness, that he had avoided it with the small, still voice within whispered that care. But his recent successes, in which was but one way was left-to yield the hand of Mary of Burgundy to any prince whose state afforded him something wherewith to balance and situation offered the most immediate prospect of benefit and support to his country -to make the price of that fair hand and the calm reflection which had long preyed upon rich dowry that went with it, the full recoghim, he went forth totally alone, merely say- nition of such popular rights as would put ing to his attendants that he would speedily the freedom and prosperity of Flanders for ever beyond a doubt, -and on his own part Of course, it is not possible to follow the to resign the hopes and aspirations that had thoughts of Albert Maurice through all the led him so far astray. But those hopes—those tortuous and uncertain ways which the human aspirations—had become parts of his very heart pursues in its examination of itself. soul; and to require him to east them from The result, however, was painful. He com- him was but to bid him die. As the bare idea pared what he had done, now that power was crossed his mind of resigning Mary of Burgiven into his hands, with what he had pro- gundy-of seeing her in the arms of another posed to do, when that power existed but in —the blood rushed up into his head with expectation. Not six months before he had violence; and he paused abruptly on his way, determined, if ever circumstances should resolved, if thought presented such images, favour the exertion of his abilities in the wide to think no more. The good and the evil arena of political strife, to dedicate all the principle were in his heart at eternal war; talents and energy of his mind solely to the good of his country—to free her from oppression—to remedy the evils of her situation—to open the way for arts and civilisation—to wife of another; in order to banish reflection place laws and rights upon such a footing altogether, and every better purpose along

He had, by this time, advanced pretty far most calm and peaceful means, without spill- into the wood, and the faint grey of the sky ing one unnecessary drop of blood - without announced that the sun was sinking rapidly causing one eye through all the land to shed below the horizon, and warned him to return to the village. The road he had followed Such had been his purpose—but what had was a long grassy path, cut by the wheels of been his conduct, and what had he become? the wood-carts; and there was no mistaking He had appropriated nearly the whole power his way back. But, as he paused, determined of the state. He had obtained influence greater to think no more, since thought required such than his fondest expectations had held out. bitter sacrifices, he looked onward vacantly, He had not improved one law. He had not ere he turned, directing his mind to external removed one evil. He had seen, under his things, the better to withdraw it from himown authority, anarchy substituted for civil self. As he did so, he remarked, at the botorder and domestic peace. He had involved tom of the slope, down which the path prohimself in the meanest wiles of faction and ceeded some large white object lying amongst intrigue. He had seen innocent blood shed the long grass which fringed a little forest stream. The distance was not more that two countenance became convulsed with pashundred yards in advance; and attracted, he knew not very well why, he strode on almost unconsciously towards the spot. As he came nearer, the object which had caught his eye assumed the form of a horse, either dead or asleep; and, to ascertain which was the case, he still walked forward, till he stood close beside it, and found that it was the carcase of a splendid charger, which had dropped, apparently, from exhaustion, and loss of blood. A rich military saddle and a poitral, inlaid with gold, announced that the rank of the rider must have been high; while a fresh wound in the poor beast's side, and another in his thigh, seemed to show that he had been engaged in the skirmish of that morning:

Albert Maurice gazed on the horse for a moment, not exactly with indifference, but with no great interest in a sight which had been frequently before his eyes during the last two or three days. The thing that principally attracted his attention, indeed, was the costliness of the caparisons; and he looked round the little glade in which he now stood, to see if he could perceive any further traces of the horse's owner. His eye instantly rested upon a pile of splendid arms, cast heedlessly down at a little distance; and as he walked forward to examine them also, a man started up, as if from sleep amongst the fern which there thickly clothed the forest ground, exclaiming,-'Who goes there?' A single glance sufficed to show Albert Maurice that he stood in presence of the Duke of Gueldres; and that prince was almost as soon aware of him whom he himself had encountered. No great love existed between them, it is true; but a natural feeling of compassion for the defeat and disappointment which the Duke had that day sustained, and a conviction that that defeat, together with his own success, had removed all danger from the rivalry of the other, greatly softened the feelings of enmity in the bosom of the young citizen; and a word would have disarmed him entirely. The contrary, however, was the case with Adolphus of Gueldres, who, naturally furious and impatient, became almost insane by defeat and disgrace. He had heard, too, it would seem, of the late successes of Albert Maurice; and jealousy and envy were thus added to hatred. His words and his manner had been quick and vehe-ment, even before he had seen who it was that roused him. But no sooner did he distinguish the features of the young citizen than the thought of his own overthrow, and of the triumph of Albert Maurice, mingled

' Ha!' he cried, 'you here, Sir mechanic! you here to insult and triumph over me !-Or have you come to finish out what we but began in the town-hall of Ghent? Doubtless you have !—quick, then, quick! Draw, sir— draw your sword, I say! Thank God, there is no one here, either to part us, or to see the Duke of Gueldres stain his blade with the blood of a low citizen.'

Albert Maurice himself was not, naturally, the most patient of men; and he instantly laid his hand upon his sword. But a better feeling checked him the moment after, and he paused in the act, saying,—'You had better reflect, my lord!' But before he could add another word the Duke of Gueldres struck him a blow with the pommel of his weapon that made him reel, and in the next moment their blades were crossed.

Complete master of every military exercise, powerful, active, quick-sighted, and calm, Albert Maurice was far more than a match for the Duke of Gueldres, though that prince had always been reputed a stout and skilful man at arms. So great, indeed, did the young President feel his own superiority to be, that, had he not been heated in some degree by the blow he had received, ne would, most probably, have contented himself with wounding or disarming his antagonist. But he was heated with the insult; and in four passes, the sword of the Duke of Gueldres—turned from its course-was wounding the empty air over the shoulder of Albert Maurice, while the blade of the young citizen passed direct through the chest of his adversary.

Albert Maurice recovered his weapon, and gazed for a moment on the Duke, whose mortal career he felt must be at its close. But that unhappy prince stood before him for an instant, still holding his sword, and still apparently firm upon his feet, though a ghastly swimming of his eyes showed what a convulsive agony was moving his frame within. He made no further effort to lunge again; but he stood there by a sort of rigid effort, which sufficed for a time to keep him from falling, though that was all. The next moment the sword dropped. He reeled giddily. and then fell back with a fearful sort of sobbing in his throat.

Albert Maurice kneeled down beside him, and strove to stanch the blood (which was now flowing copiously from his wounds), at least in such a degree as to enable him to speak, should he have any directions to give before he died. He brought some water, also, from the brook hard by, and sprinkled with remembrance of the opposition he had his face; and the Duke almost instantly formerly met with, and the cool contempt opened his eyes, and gazed wildly about for with which he had been treated on their last a moment. Then, as his glance met that of meeting, all rose up in his mind; and his Albert Maurice, he exclaimed, in the same of the best blood of the land.'

' My lord,' said Albert Maurice, solemnly, 'you have brought it on yourself. But, oh! think not of that at this moment. You are dying. There is such a thing as another world; and, oh ! repent you of your sins while you are yet in this.

Is it you tell me to repent?' cried the Duke, faintly,- 'you, who have shortened my time for repentance. What know you of my sins?'

'Nothing, but by report, my lord,' replied the young citizen; 'except, indeed-except on one occasion,—the fire at the pleasure house of Lindenmar—the death of the young heir of Hannut!'

The Duke groaned. 'Oh! were that all,' cried he-'were that all-that might soon be pardoned. For my own hands in some degree undid what my own voice commanded. But stay, stay, 'he added, speaking far more quickly, 'stay, I may do some good yet. The old man, they say, still grieves for his child. Fly to him quick. Tell him the boy did not die in the flames of Lindenmar. Tell him -tell him that I bore him away myself. Tell him that, bad as I was, I could not resist the look of helpless infancy; that I carried him away wrapped in my mantle; and, when my own boy died, bred him as my own; that I was kind to him—that I loved him, till the butchers of Duke Philip murdered him, when they cast me into prison at

A light broke at once upon the mind of the young citizen. 'Good God!' he cried, -' he is not dead. He lives, my lord—he lives. He escaped-found refuge with his own fatheray, and was instrumental in procuring your liberation from prison. He lives-indeed he lives!'

The eyes of the Duke of Gueldres fixed upon him as he spoke with an intense and half-doubting gaze. But as the young burgher repeated earnestly, 'He lives,' the dying man, by a great effort, half raised himself from the ground, clasped his hands together, and exclaimed, 'Thank God!' They were the last words he ever spoke; for almost as he uttered them, he closed his eyes as if a faint sickness had come over him-fell back upon the turf with a convulsive shudder-and in a few moments Adolphus of Gueldres was

Albert Maurice gazed upon him with a feeling of painful interest. He had slain him, it is true, under circumstances which he believed to justify the deed. But no one, that is not in heart a butcher, can, under any circumstances, take life, hand to hand, without feeling that a yards, when, to his unutterable surprise, he cloud has settled over existence for ever.

harsh and brutal tone he had before used, - - always something that can never be for-'You have slain me, fellow! you have slain gotten. In the case of the young citizen, too, me! Out upon it, churl! you have spilt some the cloud was of a deeper shade; for he felt that in the death of the Duke of Gueldres,however much justified by the immediate provocation,-he had taken another life in that course of ambition, in which he felt that many more must fall.

Thus, in gloomy bitterness, he took his way back to the village, and, without any explanation, gave orders that the dead body should be brought in with honour. The soldiers concluded that both horse and man had died by the hands of the enemy; and Albert Maurice, in quitting his quarters the next morning, gave strict directions that the remains of the deceased prince should be sent after him immediately to Ghent. Before a bier could be got ready, however, and all the necessary preparations entered into, a party from the town of Tournay swept the little village of Frasne; and the body of the Duke, being found there, was carried away by the French. Due honours were shown by the people of Tournay; and many of the writers of that age attribute the death of Adolphus, the bad Duke of Gueldres, to the successful sortie of the garrison of that

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE DRUGGIST'S PLOT.

IT was barely dawn when Albert Maurice began his last day's march towards Ghent: and though the distance was considerable, at the hour of three in the afternoon he was within a league of the city. The number of armed men that he now met with-both single individuals and small bands-showed him that the force which had retreated from before Tournay must have lately passed. And with a sort of anxious apprehension in regard to the machinations which might have taken place in Ghent during his absence, he spoke personally with almost all the stragglers he overtook; and, by a few kind words, easily induced a number of the parties of half-disciplined burghers and peasantry to join the small force he was leading into Ghent-most of them being very willing to pass for part of a conquering rather than part of a conquered army.

At the distance of about two miles from the city-at a point where the town itself was hidden by a detached wood-Albert Maurice perceived a small body of horsemen coming slowly towards him; but as such a sight had nothing extraordinary in it, he took but little heed of the party till it was within a hundred beheld the portly figure of worthy Martin There is always something to be remembered Fruse leading the van on horseback - a situation which the good burgher, as may well be soned with the magistrates in vain; and all remembered, had never coveted in his most that he had gained was the certainty that, agile and enterprising age, but which had become quite abhorrent to his feelings now Ganay had become his nephew's most bitter activity.

'Halt your troops!-halt your troops, my dear boy!' cried the worthy merchant, in some trepidation. 'Halt your troops, and listen to me while I tell you-

Had you not better speak with the honourable President apart?' said one of the party, in whom Albert Maurice instantly recognised Maitre Pierre, the eschevin who had been called to examine the dwelling of the old Lord of Neufchâtel; although, on glancing his eye other amongst the stout men at arms, of which the chief part of the band was composed.

Seeing that there was something to be communicated, and judging that no very agreeto explain the cause of his perturbation.

Martin Fruse began with a violent declamation upon the evils of riding on horseback, ended with a recapitulation of dangers sometactics of the druggist Ganay, completely out-manœuvred the little junto that the young President had left to keep them in check; and now that it was too late, Albert Maurice perceived that he had suffered his thirst for military renown to lead him aside from the paths of saner policy. Ganay himself had become the supreme object of the people's adoration; and having leagued himself by some skilful management with the Duke of Cleves on the one hand, and the populace on the other, he had been entirely successful in all the measures he had proposed to the council of magis-The States General had not again met, it was true, but a new party had been created in the town. The city of Ghent, in fact, had become completely divided, but divided unequally; for though a strong and influential body had attached themselves to Martin Fruse, the multitude adhered to his opponent.

Ganay, indeed, the worthy burgher said, not daring openly to assail one whose successes in the field were daily subject of rejoicing with the citizens, affected to act upon the instructions and desires of Albert Maurice himself; and the complete, or rather apparent union between them, which had formerly existed, had aided to deceive the people. Martin Fruse had reproached the druggist, and rea-from some cause which he could not define, that years and bulk had weighed down all enemy, though he still affected to regard him activity.

as a friend. Private information, also, had reached Martin Fruse early in the morning, that-as soon as it had been ascertained that the young citizen was on his march with the intention of reaching the city in the course of the day—Ganay, supported both by the no-bility under the Duke of Cleves and by the more violent members of the States, had determined to arrest the President that very night, at a grand banquet to be given in honour of his return; and the large body of discontented over the rest, he could recall the face of none soldiery which had been pouring into the town during the day, and who were already jealous of those who had been more successful than themselves, seemed to offer the means of accomplishing this purpose in security. Martin able intelligence awaited him, from the evi- Fruse, losing all presence of mind at the dent agitation of his friends, he gave the com- danger of his beloved nephew, had determined mand to halt his little force; and then leading to quit the city, and to meet and warn the the way into the meadow, begged his uncle object of this conspiracy of his danger ere he entered the town. The eschevin, who had been called to the hotel of the Lord of Neufchâtel, conscious that some suspicions he had and the perils thereupon attending; but he let fall concerning the death of that nobleman had rendered him obnoxious to the party what more real, which awaited his nephew if which for the time appeared triumphant, had he ventured within the gates of Ghent. It joined the good burgher; and the danger that seemed that the violent party—as Albert Mau- seemed to threaten all, had even overcome rice had apprehended-had, under the skilful the objection of Martin Fruse to the use of a

This tale was soon told; and Albert Maurice, from his own private knowledge of all the springs that were moving the dark cabals within the walls of the city before him, saw much deeper into the dangers and difficulties of his own situation than those who detailed the circumstances which had occurred since his departure. He saw that the crisis of his fate was come; and without once entertaining the vain thought of avoiding it, he merely paused to calculate how he might pass through it most triumphantly.

Fear or hesitation, doubt or even anxiety, never seemed to cross his mind for a moment. He felt, it is true, that his victory or his fall must be now complete, and that he was marching forward to a strife that must be final and decisive; but still he was eager to bring the whole to a close—perhaps from that confidence in his own powers, which is ever one great step towards success. He heard his uncle to an end with an unchanged countenance; and then, without a single observation on the intelligence he had just received, he spoke a few words to the eschevin, in a low tone, in regard to the inquisition he had charged him to make in the house of the old Lord of Neufchâtel. The answers seemed to satisfy him well; for ever and anon he bowed his head merely, 'So! Ay! Is it so?'

At length he demanded suddenly, pointing to a man-at-arms who had come up with his uncle and the party that had accompanied him, and now sat with his visor up, displaying is that? I should know his face.'

'That,' whispered his uncle, riding close up to him, 'that is good Matthew Gournay, the captain of adventurers, who was with us in the

I did, I did!' replied the young burgher; but I had forgotten all about it, in the events that have since taken place. Where is the prisoner I left in the town prison?'

'Ay! there is one of their bold acts,' answered Martin Fruse; and, as he spoke, the countenance of Albert Maurice turned deadly pale, thinking they had put to death the man he had promised to set free; but his uncle soon relieved him. 'Ay! there is one of their bold acts,' he said; 'they have moved him from the town-house to the Prévôt's prison near the gates, and threaten to do him to death to-morrow by cock-crow. Maillotin du Bac would fain have had him tried by the eschevins this morning; but the Duke of Cleves made so long a speech, and brought so much other business before the council, that they agreed to put it off till to-morrow; when he is to be interrogated at six o'clock, and have the question at seven if he refuse to

Again the President mused, without reply, though he saw that to extort confessions which would tend to create a charge against him, might be the object of the Prévôt in reserving the Vert Gallant for the torture. At length, riding up to the old man at arms, he led him apart, and conversed with him earend of that time he conducted him, with the dozen of troopers who accompanied him, had shared in his own successful expedition, The follower of Matthew Gournay execution. fell into the ranks; the adventurer put himwas perceivable in the order of the band.

of his party, and informed them calmly that reason to look upon as his political enemies. it was absolutely necessary—notwithstanding But Albert Maurice was not to be deceived; with a calm but somewhat bitter smile, saying they had or had not held any communication with himself.

What he required of them was, perhaps, somewhat hard, considering that they were peaceful men, who had no small reason to fear for their lives, and had no immediate a fresh and weather-beaten countenance, well stimulus to make them risk so much willingly. seamed with scars of ancient wounds, 'Who But Martin Fruse had seen his nephew accomplish such great things in the face of every sort of probability, and the tone in which Albert Maurice spoke was so calm and assured, that the wishes of the young citizen were received year '50, when we made a stand against the as commands; and the small party of citizens, Count of Charolois. He said you had sent now left without an escort, rode off; while the young President still halted on the road, to give them time to make the circuit proposed before his entrance.

As soon as he judged that this object was accomplished, Albert Maurice again put his troops in motion, and advanced slowly towards the city. As he emerged from the low wood that had hitherto screened him he despatched a trumpet to announce his approach to the council of Ghent, and the States of Flanders; and directed the messenger especially to speak with Signor Ganay, one of the magistrates of the town. He then resumed a quicker pace, and approached rapidly the walls of the city.

Before he reached the gates, however, it became evident that his harbinger had not spared the spur, and had already executed his commission. A large body of horsemen were seen to issue forth, accompanied by a crowd on foot; and loud shouts of joy and gratulation met the ear of Albert Maurice, -showing that the populace at least, to whom Ganay had first made his court by affecting friendship for their victorious President, had not yet become aware of the designs of his enemies. But such demonstrations of the popular joy on his return, were received by Albert Maurice as no sign that the purpose of destroying him did not exist; nor as any nestly for near a quarter of an hour. At the reason for expecting that his overthrow would not be attempted; nor as any proof that the people would oppose or resent it; to the last constabulary of the horse, which for no one knew better than himself how slight a charge will condemn the most innoand then spoke a few words with the con- cent before the fierce tribunal of the multitude, stable, or leader of the troop, who, with a or felt more bitterly how readily those who low reverence, dropped back amongst his now greeted his return would shout at his

He was surprised, however, as the two self at their head; and scarcely a difference parties drew near each other, to find that the body which had issued forth to receive him As soon as all this was completed, Albert was headed by Ganay himself, and was com-Maurice rode back to his uncle and the rest posed of all those whom he had the greatest all the events which had lately taken place- and though he received the compliments and that they should return to Ghent, and re- gratulations of the citizens on his return, and enter the town by one of the opposite gates; their thanks for his great services, with a smilso as to leave it at least doubtful whether ing countenance, and bland untroubled brow, yet his mind clearly divined the motives of so the gates of Ghent amidst the acclamations much courtesy; and he internally scoffed at of the people. the grossness of the deceit they attempted to faces round him.

The populace on foot, who crowded round, with loud and vehement shouts of 'Long live the noble President! Long live the conqueror of Le Lude!' he clearly saw were sincere enough. But in the set speech and formal moment.

language in which it is written, or, in other words, when we understand the general character of the individual. Ganay was a master in the art of dissimulation; but the young citizen was so intimately acquainted with every turn of his dark mind, that even the slight traces which he suffered to appear, people vociferated their noisy welcome. He saw, too, that ever, on each shout, Ganay redoubled his attention to himself; and he clearly perceived that, from the moment they met, his formal friend attached himself to his ing any private communication with the leadthat the tidings he had received from Martin the honours shown to him on his return, were to rest.

scorn, the significant glances which passed populace. between his foes, as, -taking on himself the

While thus Albert Maurice proceeded, surplay off upon him. He bowed, and smiled, rounded by a great number of the high citiand doffed his cap and plume to every one zens, the troops he commanded followed in a who affected to congratulate him; but he well long line, now swelled to the amount of nearly understood that he was surrounded by doubt- fifteen hundred men. The whole cavalcade ful friends or concealed enemies; and watched moved on towards the market-place; but carefully every changing expression of the some persons who remained near the drawbridge, remarked that the last band of soldiers did not follow the rest; but, halting at the gate, relieved the guard that was there on duty, and then passed on, in a different direction, by the low streets which ran under the walls. At the same time, however, three of courtesy of the different members of the States the troopers were detached, and, at once, rehe beheld much to distrust, and calmly pre-passing the gates, galloped off at full speed, pared for those great and bold measures which in the direction of Heusden and Melle. It were alone fitted to meet the exigency of the was farther observed, and commented upon in other days, that in about two hours after-Albert Maurice was a reader of the human wards, three bands of men at arms came up countenance, -a book, every volume of which from the same quarter, at a quick pace, and is easy to comprehend, when we know the entered the city, without even being questioned by the guard. To what spot they went in the city was not very clearly ascertained, but it was generally reported that they made their way in small parties to the town-house.

In the meanwhile, Albert Maurice and the rest pursued their march towards that buildwere as legible to Albert Maurice, as if he ing, the crowds increasing every moment as had seen into his heart. He marked a tran-sient and scarcely preceptible shade come acclamations. With his helmet, lance, and over the brow of the druggist, whenever the shield carried by pages behind him, as if he had been the most distinguished knight in the land—with his cap and plume in his hand, and bowing his fine head low at every shout of the multitude, the young citizen advanced towards what was called the Perron of the side, and strove anxiously to prevent his hold- Hôtel de Ville, on which he found collected, to do him honour, the Duke of Cleves and a ers of his troops. From all this, he judged number of the other nobles of the town and neighbourhood. Knowing their league against Fruse were substantially correct; and that him, and what a mockery they considered this public reception of a simple burgher, Albert only to deceive the people, while any act that Maurice could scarcely prevent the scorn he was meditated against him was to be executed felt in his heart from curling his proud lip. at night, after the lower orders had retired But he did not prevent it, and merely thinking, like Hamlet, - 'They fool me to the top Albert Maurice affected to be entirely de- of my bent,'-he dismounted from his horse ceived, and rode on with the party who had at the steps, and played exactly the part come to welcome him, with every appearance which he well knew they expected from him. of friendship and confidence. He spoke After receiving, with a degree both of haughtifreely and calmly with those around him; ad- ness and humility, the gratulations of the dressed Ganay frequently in a low and con- nobles upon his successful expedition, he fidential tone; and, at the same time, assumed turned and addressed the lower orders of all that state and dignity, which he knew that Ghent in a long and flattering harangue, his enemies expected him to display. He throughout which the close of every period marked, too, with a feeling of suppressed was drowned in the enthusiastic cheers of the

'It were hard, my friends,' he added, in principal place, and with an air and demean- conclusion, 'that you should all come out our, which might have suited the most potent hither to welcome my return, and I should monarch in Christendom-he rode through give you no sign of my good will. Fain would

I have you all to sup with me; but, in good faith, there are so many here, -- some twenty that even, by the parties who spoke, their thousand, as I guess,—that no house could meaning was probably gathered more com-hold the multitude I see around me. How- pletely by their mutual looks, than by any disever, it is a fair and beautiful evening, and tinct sounds. A white-haired old soldier, there is no better roof than the sky. Now, however, who was pushing up the steps after as these noble lords and worthy merchants the young President, just heard Ganay add, have invited me to banquet with them within, I invite you all to sup here in the marketplace, and by seven of the clock you shall Duke emphatically; and they both passed on. find good ale and beef enough to satisfy you, if I give the last stiver of my private fortune to entertain the good artisans of Ghent.

A loud shout burst from the people, but Ganay and his friends exchanged glances not of the most pleasant kind. Nor were their looks rendered more placid, when they heard an order given by the young President to his round the market-place, and to quarter themselves in the wide halls and vacant chambers of the Hôtel de Ville. Ganay even ventured to remonstrate against turning the town-house into a barrack, but he was instantly silenced by Albert Maurice.

'I have heard, my excellent, good friend,' he replied, 'since my return to Ghent, that the fifteen thousand men, who were driven like sheep from before Tournay, have been received in this city, and quartered in the cording to his orders, seemed to take upon different barracks. I know, therefore, that themselves a tone of authority and power not there can be no room to spare, and what you very pleasing to his adversaries; yet this also urge with regard to the illegality of bringing troops into the town-house, you must well know does not apply in the present case. The troops which I have resolved to station ever, a number of persons were observed there are the troops of the city of Ghent, not ascending to his apartments, whose faces no those of either a foreign or a native prince.'

Ganay, seeing that by the very measures citizens of Ghent, and great was the anxiety which he had taken to secure the safe execu- and discussion which these appearances caused tion of his purpose against the young citizen, amongst the enemies of the young citizen. he had, in fact, over-reached himself,- 'but Every means was taken to discover whence for the informality of the thing, would it not they came, and what was their errand, but it be better, as there is no room for them in the was all in vain. The Duke of Cleves retired little villages in the neighbourhood?

suming an air of indignation; - 'what! make pointed for the banquet, which would put an the victorious troops, that have so well served end, he believed, for ever, to transactions the city, give place to those who have brought which, from many causes, he both doubted nothing but disgrace upon us! No, no, Master Ganay, let us hear no more of this. My orders must be obeyed;' and so saying, he and even painful nature, and his conclusions turned and advanced towards the door of the in regard to the young citizen's conduct were town-house.

A short and rapid conversation was now carried on, in a low tone, between the druggist and the Duke of Cleves, as they ascended the steps towards the hall. 'It will be impossible to-night,' whispered the noble.

'If he live over to-morrow,' replied Ganay, 'no earthly power will overthrow him.'

A few words succeeded, in so low a tone, 'If I do, will you justify and defend me?'

'Any thing to get rid of him!' replied the

The sun was, by this time, beginning to descend in the western sky; and on entering the town-house, the young citizen retired to the apartments which had been assigned him in that building, and remained long in consultation with various persons, who were admitted to him one after another. The individuals who thus visited him were all troops, purporting that they were to stable marked by the opposite faction, which retheir horses in whatever sheds they could find mained in the other parts of the town-house; and it was seen that, besides Martin Fruse, and a number of the burghers adhering to the party of that good citizen, almost all the leaders of the bands which had accompanied the young President in his expedition to Lille and Douai, were admitted, and remained with him long.

All this, however, appeared natural enough, and though his troops, in quartering themselves in different parts of the building, acmight pass for the swagger and insolence of military success; nor did it excite any very great surprise. As the evening went on, howone recognised. Some stayed and some re-'But for the informality of the thing,' urged turned; but it was evident that they were not town, to march them into any of the pleasant to his own hotel to prepare for the scenes that were about to take place; and Ganay 'What!' exclaimed Albert Maurice, as- waited eagerly the coming of the hour apand feared.

Nevertheless, his sensations were of a mixed less clear and decided than they had ever been before. He did not and would not believe that Albert Maurice suspected the precise design of those who had contrived his overthrow; but he saw evidently that he was not deceived by all the fair appearances which had welcomed him back to Ghent; and he felt that the moment was come when, as the President had long before foreseen, the immediate destruction of the one was necessary to the safety of the other. That conviction in his own bosom of course made him believe that Albert Maurice was equally alive to the same fact; and as the means which he had so carefully prepared during the absence of the other had been, in some degree, rendered vain by the measures that the President had taken, the druggist now stood resolved to snatch the first opportunity of executing his purpose by any means, however great the risk, well knowing that the peril of delay was still greater. And yet, strange to say, there was within the bosom of that man, -hardened as he was by crimes, and still more hardened by the struggle of passions concealed within his breast through a long life,—strange to say, there was a feeling of deep regret, of bitter repugnance, when he thought of the very act he planned for his own security. If ever there had been, in the course of all his existence, a being that he had sincerely loved, besides his own unhappy son, that being had been Albert Maurice: and though, in the scenes of civil faction and the strife of contending interests and desires which they had lately passed through, that affection had been apparently smothered, it is wonderful how freshly it rose up in his heart when he thought that Albert Maurice must die by his means,—possibly by his own hand.

The fatal creed he held of man's entire mortality, made him fearless of death himself, and careless of inflicting it on others; but, perhaps, by teaching him that the loves and affections of this life were all, it made them take a deeper hold upon his heart, when once they could grasp it by any means; and for a moment, as he thought of cutting off the noble being whose powers he had so often admired,—of extinguishing for ever all those fiery energies and bright aspirations he had watched from their first breaking forth to their full expansion,—he shuddered at the task.

The people without, witnessing the preparations for the banquet to which the young citizen had invited them, from time to time shouted forth his name with loud applause, and there was a voice within the bosom of Ganay that echoed their praises. 'He is indeed a splendid creature,' he thought; 'and if ever there was one calculated to win all hearts, and lead men and nations on to scenes and glories such as the world has never yet seen, he is the man. Yet, after all, he must die! and 'tis but like the slaughter of a mighty stag or a noble boar; and death—which ends all things—perhaps, when the pain and the pleasure of life are fairly balanced, is the crowning good that renders the whole equal at last; but I must speed to see all prepared!'

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE FEAST AT GHENT.

NEVER had the town of Ghent witnessed so magnificent a sight as on the night after the return of Albert Maurice. The whole mar-ket-place before the Stadt Huys, illuminated by a thousand torches, was crowded with people regaling at long tables, which groaned beneath the burden of good cheer. young President had spared no means to satisfy all; and, by the magic influence of gold, had, in the short time which had elapsed since his return, conjured up a festival more like some of those fairy banquets depicted in an Eastern tale, than anything in real life. Thousands and thousands, too, of wealthier classes, whose circumstances raised them above those who came to partake of his bounty, moved through the open spaces, enjoying the scene. The Perron of the Hôtel de Ville was crowded with guards, officers, and attendants, looking over the gay and happy sight which the square afforded; and above all, rose the dark mass of the townhouse, with a blaze of light flashing forth from all the open windows, while the sound of music from within, and the glancing of figures moving rapidly across the lights, offered links of interest between the feelings of the crowd without, and the transactions that were passing in the building.

A knot of the more curious citizens had stationed themselves on the little rise by the fountain, and watched eagerly the windows of the hall, where the banquet was just about to take place; and at length, when a loud flourish of trumpets echoed out upon the air, some of them were heard to exclaim, 'Now! now they are coming to the tables! See, see! they are passing along! There is the Duke of Cleves; I know him by the limp in his gait; and there is the President, -there is the noble President! See how he overtops them all, and how his plumes dance above the highest in the hall! Hurrah for the noble President!' and the multitude catching the sound, burst forth with a loud and universal cheer, that made the buildings around echo and re-echo with the shout.

Although, at that distance

Although, at that distance, it was difficult to distinguish the persons within, yet the shout was not unappropriate, for it was, indeed, Albert Maurice who—received as a guest by the States of Flanders, and the nobles and prime burghers of Ghent—was advancing to the seat prepared for him. Long consultations had been previously held in regard to where that seat was to be placed; for feudal states in general required that a marked distinction should be observed between nobles admiration which the States of Flandersand citizens; but the druggist counselled the nobles to fool the young citizen's pride to the utmost for that one night. The example of Artevelte-a common tradesman of that very town, who had sat and treated with the highest princes of Europe-was cited, and prevailed; and the President of Ghent took his chair by the Duke of Cleves, with Ganay, by a previous arrangement, seated beside

The face of the druggist was uncommonly pale. He had marked the immense concourse of people in the square: he had marked the multitude of guards and attendants that crowded the terrace, and thronged the halls of the town-house; and he knew the infinite perils that attended the deed he had undertaken to perform. Whatever course events might take, he felt that fate brooded heavily over the whole splendid scene; and his small, clear, dark eye wandered somewhat wildly round the hall, especially as, in following Albert Maurice towards the seat it had been arranged he was to occupy, the thundering shout of the multitude without burst upon his ear. All, however, passed in tranquil ease: the whole party were seated; and the attendants of the Duke of Cleves-somewhat more numerous than necessary—drew round the upper end of the table. But as they did so, they perceived that they enclosed amongst themselves two or three strange men, on whose intrusion they remonstrated somewhat roughly. What the others answered was not heard, but they kept their place, and the ban-

Everything was rich and splendid, according to the custom of that time; and many a fish and many a fowl appeared upon the table, which have either lost their palatable flavour in latter days, or have been discarded by some depravity of human taste. Albert Maurice ate sparingly and drank little; but he was more gay and cheerful than, perhaps, any one had ever seen him before; and, with the whole, there was an air of easy dignity, which left any outward difference that might all within his scope to uphold his native land be observed between himself and any of the has still done nothing but that which he was nobles around, entirely to his advantage.

proceeded, his cheek grew flushed, and his eye sparkled more, but he was silent, absent, and thoughtful, and shrunk when the eye of Albert Maurice rested on him, even for a moment, in conversation. At length the Duke applause-are my feelings personal alone. of Cleves rose, and addressed the druggist rejoice more that you have so honoured and briefly, saying, 'Master Ganay, you are an rewarded the first man who has been enabled orator, and I am none; and besides, as one of to render service in arms to the State, since the consuls of the good town of Ghent, the her restoration to freedom, than that the first task I am going to put upon you falls more was Albert Maurice. I rejoice chiefly, benaturally to you than to me. Fill, then, you cause I am sure that the distinction shown to golden hanap to the brim, and express, if you me-unworthy as I am-this night will be the can find language to do so, the gratitude and means of calling others forth in the service of nobles and commons alike-feel for him who has won the first successes in arms for his native country against her base invaders,successes which, I trust, may but be the earnest of many more.'

Ganay took the large golden cup, and held it to an officer who filled it with wine; but as the druggist again brought it back he leaned his hand upon the edge for a moment, and something was seen, by the eyes of more persons than one, to fall into the chalice. rose, however, with greater composure than he had hitherto displayed through the evening; and with a happy flow of words, the very choiceness and selection of which made his speech seem far more vigorous and enthusiastic than it really was, he commented on the talents and successes of the young citizen, and thanked him in the name of the town of Ghent and the States of Flanders, for the services he had rendered to his country.

It is scarcely necessary, perhaps, to state that it was the common custom of the day for a person publicly drinking to another in such a manner, to taste the wine himself, and then to send the cup to him whom he addressed. Ganay, accordingly, at the end of his oration, raised the hanap to his lips, and held it there for a moment; and then, according to form. gave it to the cupbearer, who presented it to the young burgher. Albert Maurice took the chalice, and then rose, while the eye of the druggist fixed upon him with a gaze that had something almost fearful in its very intensity.

Noble lords,' he said, in a clear, mellow, steady voice; - 'noble lords! dear fellowcitizens! worthy men of Flanders! you have been pleased this day to show me honours, far higher than my poor merits gave me any title to expect. The duty of a citizen to his country is one which, however zealously executed, affords him no claim to thanks; for being an obligation imposed on him by his birth, it binds him strictly through his life; and even at his death, he that has done bound to do. Nevertheless, it is hard to say Ganay drank deep; and as the banquet how much I rejoice that the men of Ghent and the States of Flanders have thought fit, by such distinguished honours, to reward such poor services as mine. Nor-however grateful to my heart may be your generous the country, whom diffidence of their own testimony came from all the most honourable to accept what they may believe inefficient watched the proceedings of the druggist. service, has hitherto kept back from the path of fame. When an individual serves his President!' said the Duke of Cleves. country to the utmost of his power, he does but his duty to that country, and no more; of Cleves!' replied Albert Maurice, bending unto you all!'

Albert Maurice had spoken calmly and col-design. lectedly, and not a word betrayed that there leagued in the same evil conspiracy; and did and then tossing the cup into the midst of the sciousness of their own treachery-I say only, did not know you, murderer?'

ing up-'know me now!' and he sprang into them by you arch traitor who now lies towards Albert Maurice like a famished tiger. dead, will learn from my conduct this night, But at that moment, the man who stood that I am not the man that I have been behind his chair, strode forward; something represented; and those who, for baser rea-bright waved above the druggist as he rose, sons, would have compassed my death, may descended at once upon his head, and cleft its also learn, that such designs fall ever, sooner way through to the very eyes. Ganay fell or later, on the heads of those that framed back from his place, dead upon the floor of them. Those who love me not, therefore, the hall; but even as he fell, his hand, armed may depart in peace; those who love me and with a short poinard, aimed an impotent Ghent, remain; and let us finish our festiviringing against the pavement.

rice, rapidly. 'Matthew Gournay, you have us.—Take away the corpse!' done well! Let no one dare to approach the The guests looked upon corpse! Look at him as he lies, lords and inquiring glances, as they stood around the free citizens! Look at him as he lies, with table in the same attitudes into which they the weapon of destruction in his hand! And had started, on the sudden catastrophe they you, my friends, whom I stationed round had just witnessed; but few present were about, did you not see him drop the poison in willing, by quitting the hall as the young the cup as clearly as I did?

We did !-we did !-we did !' cried a dozen enemies to Albert Maurice and to Ghent. voices round the table; and those who were at first inclined to look somewhat fiercely sumed his seat, which he did, murmuring,upon these witnesses, soon perceived that the 'He was an unworthy man, that Ganay, and a powers, or doubts of the State's willingness citizens of Ghent, who, forewarned, had

'These are bold and terrible deeds, Sir

'Not so bold as some I could name, Duke but when the State recompenses its individual his brows sternly upon him. 'The man who servants even beyond their deserts, it does its lies before you has already more than one duty to itself, and insures the most zealous murder on his head. There are the proofs services of all its children: for the men who of his participation in the death of the good will serve a niggard master well, because it is old Lord of Neufchâtel, who died by poison their duty, will serve a liberal one with their while recovering from his wounds. For these whole heart and soul; and let me say, there proofs I have to thank you worthy and fearless is a mighty difference.—Men of Ghent,' con-tinued the young President, 'and you noble would have been produced before the judges barons and burghers of Flanders, I give you of this city, had I not discovered the purpose all deep and heartfelt thanks; and I drink of this base assassin to poison me this night, and taken proper means to counteract his There are others here present, was one feeling in his heart but tranquil con- I so please, I could name them one by one fidence. As he paused and lifted the cup in Look not to your attendants, Duke of Cleves; his hand, the gaze of Ganay grew more and for know, that in this building and around it more intense, his pale lip quivered, and a I have enough faithful friends, to bind every bright red spot glowed on his ashy cheek, traitor present hand and foot, and give them while the young citizen continued to raise the over to the common hangman-did I so will cup slowly towards his lip. Suddenly, howit. But fear not; I neither accuse you nor ever, Albert Maurice paused, and turned his absolve you, my lord. You came here a glance with a movement as quick as light guest to the city of Ghent, and you depart upon the druggist, into whose face the blood unopposed, uninjured, with this warning only rushed with fearful violence as their eyes met. - beware how you entertain a thought against Sternly and stedfastly the young President the liberties of the people. To the rest-gazed on him, while one might count fifty, within whose bosoms dwell the fearful con-To the resthall, he exclaimed, with a scornful laugh,- I do not dread them; and from my confidence 'No, no! No, no! Did you dream that I in myself and in the people of Ghent, they find safety. Those who were moved to seek 'Know me now then!' cried Ganay, start- my overthrow by fears and doubts, instilled blow at the young President, which struck ties, for the death of that base man is no more to be noted than the shooting of a wolf, 'Ho! close the doors!' cried Albert Mau- or any other wild beast that would destroy

The guests looked upon each other with President permitted, to brand themselves as

Good Martin Fruse was the first who re-disgrace to the city. He nearly caused my hundred-fold; and if she suspected you of good Martin Fruse. The Duke of Cleves, partisans, remained standing; and after a brief pause, moved a step towards the door.

derstood that the mode of death to which his resume their seats at once.

'It is not my custom,' he said, 'to sit and drink in halls where blood has just been shed; and without being an enemy to Ghent, or any of her true and faithful sons, I may be pardoned for quitting a place, where I know not what is to happen next.'

tended to happen next; though, perhaps, my offence to some here present. But not to intrust him with greater authority than he has bandy words with so high a prince, I have hitherto enjoyed. only further to say, that the citizens of Ghent have been honoured by your presence while tion; and the citizens—some eager to show it has lasted; and you have, in return, been that they had no participation in the plot treated with a goodly and instructive, though which had just been frustrated-some carried somewhat fearful, spectacle-showing how away by the general enthusiasm-and some the men of this city punish those who attempt from the first devoted to the young President to poison them at their solemn feasts. Make way for the Duke of Cleves, there!' And with an air in which courtesy and grace gave additional point to the keen scorn that curled his lip and bent his brow, Albert Maurice led the Duke towards the door, and bowed low than he thought prudent to accept. 'No. as he passed out.

seat; his lip softened, his brow unbent, and, in this very hall, on Jacob Von Artevelte, with gazing round the guests with one of those this further restriction, that I shall submit, bland smiles which often win approbation for every month, the revenues intrusted to my the past, by seeming certain of applause, he disposal to the inspection of three persons exclaimed, - 'Friends, have I done well?'

most zealous of that violent party, on whose do; and thus will you guard against those support Ganay had founded his authority; abuses to which the unlimited confidence of and Albert Maurice prepared for bold opposi- your ancestors gave rise. Nothing more will tion; for he knew him to be fierce and fear- I accept. less, though honest and upright in purpose. By one of those sudden revolutions of feeling, was law, and the whole arrangement was however, which are common in scenes of speedily completed. One more deep cup of great excitement, the whole sentiments of the red wine each man present quaffed to the partisan had become changed by the frank health of Albert Maurice, and then took leave, and determined demeanour of the young citi- one by one. Martin Fruse was the last that zen; and he answered at once,-'So well left him; and as he did so, the good old man have you done, Sir President, that, in my wrung his hand hard. 'Farewell, Albert,' opinion, if Ghent owed you gratitude before, he said; 'I have seen you a little child, and death some twenty years ago.' any baseness, those suspicions should be done

Those who heard this new charge against away for ever. To many of us you have been the unhappy druggist started, and many represented as courting the nobility for your looked wise, and shook the sagacious head, own purposes, and seeking alone, in all you own purposes, and seeking alone, in all you exclaiming,—'Ah! we always knew he was have done, your own aggrandisement. Some a wicked man!' but Albert Maurice, who un- of us, too.—I for one, he added boldly, consented to your arrest this night. I acuncle alluded was not quite deserving of such knowledge it; and frankly I acknowledge I serious comment, again called upon those was wrong. But believe me, Sir President, who were friends to Ghent, and to himself, to when with the same voice I declare, that, had I ever dreamed of the scheme for murdering One after another, all the citizens, and you here, my own knife should first have almost all the nobles, followed the example of drunk the blood of the assassin. Justly has he been done to death; and wisely have you however, together with a few of his immediate treated yon proud prince, who courts us now, only, that he may first rise by us, and then crush us hereafter; and who-as no one that saw his countenance can doubt-was leagued with the dead assassin. It is the policy of those that hate us, to set us at variance amongst ourselves, and remove from us all the men whose talents and whose firmness will enable us to triumph still. Let us, then, 'Fortunately for myself, my lord,' replied all pledge ourselves to union; and, in order Albert Maurice, 'I did know what was in- to preserve him who alone possesses genius and power sufficient to lead us properly, let having spoiled the design may be matter of us give him a guard of five hundred men, and

The proposal was received with acclama-

-vied with each other in voting him new powers and new dignities. At that moment he might have commanded anything in the power of the States of Flanders to bestow: and much more was spontaneously offered no!' he said; 'limit the power you grant me The young President then resumed his to that which your fathers formerly conferred, chosen from your own body. Thus shall I be The man who rose to reply was one of the enabled to serve you as much as man can

The will of the young citizen for the time that gratitude ought now to be increased a I have seen you a stately man, and I have loved you better than anything else on earth enterprise and ambition. Touched by the it would slay me to see you fall.'

CHAPTER XXXVII.

MARY MAKES A CONFIDANT.

FEW, but those who have passed through but struggling in the narrow battle-field of thank him for his liberation. Next appeared their own bosoms, can at all comprehend what it is, after hours of contention, difficulty, and stroke of the executioner; and then, again, like angel or devil, visits the lonely sojourner the death of his defender, in the wilderness of being, to raise him to the 'So many in so short a sky, or plunge him in the abyss,-if there be of mighty things endeavoured and achieved.

of such fearful excitement, as few have ever my country alone!' he thought again. 'Nay passed upon this earth, -after having seen his -nay-nay-for my own ambition. Whatown life, and power, and hopes, in momen- what act have I done yet for the good of my tary danger, -after having controlled and country alone? None, alas! none! and even concealed his own passions, and bridled, and now, perhaps,—even now, when ambition has governed, and guided those of others, -after swallowed up all-when I have reached the very having overthrown his enemies, slain his be- pinnacle of success, - perhaps the only one I multiplied events of the last two hours; and die!' out of the smoke of memory rose the giant consciousness that he was successful-triumphantly successful!

former days, speaking the words of hope to who brought him a high plumed bonnet and his own ear, and cheering him on the path of richly decorated cloak—'no! no! these vest-

throughout my life. You have now reached magic wand of association, the splendid a dizzy height, my dear boy; and, oh! take objects which he had just been contemplating care that your head do not turn giddy. For began to change their form and lose their my sake, if not for your own, take care; -for brightness. A dull weight of thought seemed to fall upon him, and his utmost efforts would not throw it off. It seemed as if some fiend, in bitter mockery, resolved to conjure up the faces of the dead, and to torture his heart with painful recollections, even in the hour of triumph. To the form of the druggist, next succeeded, before the eye of fancy, that of the Duke of Gueldres, dyeing the green sward with his blood; and then, the shifting picture Few, but those who have passed through with his blood, assented the same prince as giant passions not only acting around them, when first, with buoyant joy, he came to the theoretical translating in the parrow battle-field of thank him for his liberation. Next appeared danger—where life and death hung upon a he saw them as they had appeared at the breath or movement—to find one's self alone council, when he had been examined on the and successful. If there he a feeling amongst accusation of the Prévôt; while the calm, the many which visit the human heart, in this grave, noble countenance of Imbercourt was dark and misty abode of mortal existence, - seen, by imagination, pleading eagerly in exif there be a feeling amongst all those which, culpation of him who had since worked out

'So many in so short a time!' thought Albert Maurice. 'Yet have they died, each for a feeling on earth that really deserves the his own misdeeds; and I have sacrificed them name of sublime, it is the first calm sensa—ay, and with pain—for the good of my tion of dangers encountered and conquered, country alone! He almost started at the of mighty things endeavoured and achieved. Albert Maurice sat alone, after an evening lie to so base a delusion. 'For the good of trayer, secured his authority, and taken have suffered to escape—perhaps yon Duke of all but one small easy step to the very sum- Cleves, is even now plotting to deprive me of mit of his ambition. Oh, what a host of the only reward that can wipe away every mingled sensations crowded rapidly on his evil memory, repay every effort, tranquillise heart! and how dizzily his brain whirled for every pain, and render success a blessing inthe first few brief moments, while remem- deed. But he shall plot in vain; and if he brance rapidly brought before him all the dare to plot, by the Lord that lives, he shall

'Ho! without there!' he continued, aloud, 'Bring me a hat and cloak! Oh, good Matthew Gournay, I had forgot,' he added, as he For an instant his lip curled with a proud saw who it was that answered his summonsand satisfied smile; and everything was for- 'this very night your noble lord shall be set gotten, but that bright bubble—success. But, free. But I must see him myself; I have as he sat, a sort of lassitude came over him; tidings for him which will gladden his heart, his eye fell casually on the spot where the You, too, shall not be forgotten; and though, druggist Ganay had lain, convulsed in the I know, gold can never pay such services as agonies of death; and, by a caprice of the yours, yet there are other means within my imagination, the same face which had then power. This very night we will set free your appeared streaked with ghastly blood, and lord. In all the turbulence of the past even-contorted with the pangs of dissolution, was ing, I had forgot what I should have remempresented to his memory, as he had seen it in bered.-No, no, boy!' he added to the page ments I have on are all too fine already. I warder of the fortified gate. He gave his nearly ten.

The President mused thoughtfully till the boy returned, and honest Matthew Gournay, seeing that deep and agitating thoughts were engrossing all his attention, stood quietly gazing on the spot where he had slain the unhappy Ganay, and wondering that any man should take the trouble of poisoning another, when he might rid himself of his enemy so easily by the dagger or the sword.

At length the hat and cloak were brought; and Albert Maurice drew the one round his person, and the other over his brow. 'Now, Matthew Gournay,' he said, 'take five-andtwenty men, and bid them follow me by separate ways to the palace. There wait till I come. I will be in the square almost as soon as you; and after I have spent some ten minutes in transacting business which admits of no delay, we will go on and liberate your

The ring wrich Matthew Gournay had received from his young lord acted with the magic effect of some talisman in an Eastern tale; and whatever commands he received from Albert Maurice, he obeyed at once, with unquestioning alacrity. The five-and-twenty men were soon summoned,-for the whole force of the free companions had been poured into the town of Ghent, during the evening, by means of the gate which, as we have seen, the followers of the President had secured on his first entering the city. A few brief words directed them by different ways to the palace, and, passing through the various crowds which had been gathered together for the entertainment in the square, and which were now discussing, in eager tones, the events that had taken place in the town-house, the men selected to accompany, or rather to follow, the young citizen, soon made their way to the gates of the palace.

That part of the town was nearly deserted, and the little square before the Cours du Prince was void and solitary, except where, nearly in the midst, a tall, dark figure, with its arms crossed upon its chest, stood gazing up at the building. All was quiet, and calm, and dark along the façade of the palace, except where, here and there, from some of the long narrow windows, a stream of tremulous light broke out upon the night.

For several moments the figure continued to gaze, apparently fixing its glance earnestly who had outwalked all his followers, advanced, arrival. His eye, however, instantly rested and, after speaking a few words to Matthew upon Mary of Burgundy, as she sat surrounded would have something to conceal my rank— name and station, and urged business of immy station in the city, I should say. Get me portance as an excuse for the lateness of his some servant's cloak and hat. Be quick! 'tis visit. The warder replied in a tone of humble deference, which circumstances had compelled the proud soldiers of Burgundy to learn in speaking to the once contemned burghers of Ghent, telling him that he would willingly admit him, but that, as his orders had been very strict for the last week, he must detain him at the gate while he caused the Princess to be informed of the fact.

Albert Maurice made no objection, and remained, musing with a downcast countenance. across which the shadows of many emotions were passing that he would not willingly have shown to the eye of open day. As calm and tranquil as a summer's morning, he had sat his horse in the midst of battle and conflict. Calmly, too, he had remained beside the man who was mixing a cup of poison for his lip, and preparing the dagger if the cup should fail. But now every nerve thrilled, and his heart beat faint like a coward's. though he was but about to meet a fair and gentle girl, whose fate might almost be said to rest in his own hands. He had hoped, and he had dreamt, through many a long day; and various circumstances had combined to give those hopes and dreams a tangible foundation and a definite form. But now that the moment approached when they were to be realised or destroyed for ever, they faded all away into fears and anxieties.

The warder returned and bowed low, while the gates were thrown open. The soldiers within the court did military honours to the President of Ghent; and, assuming a firmer step and a prouder air, Albert Maurice passed on within the precincts of the palace, followed by the train who had met him according to his appointment. At the entrance-hall his followers paused; and he himself, ushered forward by one of the domestic attendants of the Princess, ascended the steps towards a smaller chamber, adjoining the great hall of

In the ante-room he cast off his hat and cloak, and remained in the rich dress in which he had descended to the banquet in the townhouse; and, as he passed on towards the door which the servant threw open, his eye fell upon a Venetian mirror, and perhaps he gained another ray of hope, from feeling that, in appearance as well as mind, he was not unfitted to move through those lordly halls, in the high station for which his ambition strove.

The chamber that he entered was but dimly ugaze, apparency fixing its guitar length, lighted; and it was evident that the preparaperceiving the number of soldiers collecting tions for receiving him there had only been before the gate, Albert Maurice, for he it was, made upon the sudden announcement of his Gournay, demanded admission from the by a number of her women; and the sweet through his heart, that he felt the resolution passing in his bosom flashed across the mind which had brought him thither shaken, lest, by seeking for deeper happiness, he should the moment, with a feeling of terror which lose even the joy of that sweet smile itself.

come back again to Ghent. For though we rapid thought, she ran over the circumstances have had great joy from your victories and successes—the first that have ever yet blessed our cause-yet we have much needed your presence in the city.'

'I hope, lady,' replied the young citizen, with a tone of deep interest in all that concerned her immediate happiness; 'I hope that you have suffered no personal annoyance; for, believe me, before I went, I took every one else.

'From the Duke of Gueldres,' replied Mary, some of the late conflicts, I have, indeed, suffered nothing; nor have I truly to comcousin of Cleves does, perhaps, press me somewhat unkindly to an union, which is little less that there was some resource—though the only discussion.

anger; and he replied, 'Fear not, dear lady; his importunities shall not press upon your grace much longer. The city of Ghent and the States of Flanders have this night armed sweep-to-to-

the bold and ambitious words that had been just springing to his lips, he felt must not be rashly uttered in the ear of one whose love was to be gained and fixed, and whose handalthough it was the crowning object of all his heart. ambition-though it was the motive for every energy and endeavour of his bosom-would at once become vain and valueless, if un- the nation she was called upon to govern and accompanied by her heart.

He paused, and then continued,--' Have armed me with sufficient power at once to guide the state, I trust, to permanent security domestic life every pain, anxiety, and fear.'

The last words were spoken low and slowly: and as he pronounced them, he dropped his eyes to the ground; while the warm conscious blood rose up into his cheeks, and spoke far more than his lips. The words he uttered, it is true, had no very definite meaning, and might be taken up in a very general sense; but the tone, the manner, the hesitation, the flushing of the cheek, the timid glance of the eye, gave emphasis and purpose to the whole.

smile with which she welcomed him so thrilled For the first time, a suspicion of what was of Mary of Burgundy, and inspired her, for approached very nearly to despair. She turned 'Welcome, my lord,' she said; 'most wel- deadly pale, and trembled violently, as, with of her situation, and found how helpless she was if that suspicion were well founded. It was but for an instant, however, that she gave way to apprehension. From the first, she had appreciated the general character of Albert Maurice, especially its finer points, by a sort of instinctive comparison with her own. She knew that he was generous, high-spirited, noble-minded; and, though she might now means to guard you from the importunity of find that her estimate of his ambition had been the Duke of Gueldres, or the intrusion of any far below that which it should have been, yet she trusted to the better parts of his disposition to deliver her from the consequences of who I hear-unhappy man-has fallen in the worse. She knew that she was in his power. She felt that his will was law, in all the country that surrounded her; and that, if plain of any one else. Though my good he chose, he could blast her hopes and happiness for ever. But, at the same time, she felt fearful in my eyes than the other. Doubtless, one-in the native generosity of his heart; and however, he deems it for my good, and strong she determined to appeal to it boldly as her are the reasons he urges; but having taken on sole refuge from despair. It is true that an myself to decide, and having told him that union with Albert Maurice, whose many decision, I would fain be spared all further splendid qualities she could not but acknowledge, might-were such feelings susceptible The cheek of Albert Maurice reddened with of any very marked shades of difference, and had it been possible for her to dream for one moment of such an union-might have been less repugnant to her, than the marriages which had been proposed with the drivelling me, thank God! with sufficient power to boy of France, with the coarse and brutal son of the Duke of Cleves, or with the cruel and Albert Maurice paused and hesitated; for unnatural Duke of Gueldres. But still the simple fact existed-she loved another with all the deep sincerity of a woman's first affection, and the very thought of any other alliance was abhorrent to every feeling of her

Nothing could have balanced those feelings in her bosom but her strong sense of duty to protect. She could, indeed, and would have sacrificed everything for her country and her people; but that people themselves had rejected the only alliance that could have beneand peace; and to sweep away from your fited them; and, in the present instance, no such object could be gained by her marriage with the President of Ghent as that which the French alliance might have accomplished, even could she have entertained the thought for one moment of bestowing the hand of the heiress of Burgundy on an adventurous and aspiring citizen, -a thought from which all Mary's feelings revolted, not the less strongly from the natural gentleness of her character. Had time for thought been added, the discovery or the suspicion of his love might have afforded a key to all the conduct of the young me !- that your individual happiness is no less from worse apprehensions. to the bystanders, seemed perfectly simple.

bless you.

that happiness may be best consulted.'

On the other hand, Mary was herself embar- briefly, lest I should fail. rassed by his request, which was not a little seat. Albert Maurice stood beside her, with your people are distracted by different parties, calmly on the Princess.

'Madam,' he said, in a firmer voice than in your love! he had hitherto commanded, 'your general welfare, and that of your people, is un-something in the conduct and demeanour of doubtedly one great, and ought to be one Mary of Burgundy through that night, had paramount, object with me in all I strive for; already shown him that one-half of his dreams

citizen, and, by showing to what deeds his a deep and overpowering consideration in my passion had already betrayed him, might have mind. Lady, I know, and feel painfully, that increased a thousand-fold the terror of the un- the great difference of rank and station behappy Princess; but, luckily, the considera- tween us, may prevent you from conceiving tion of her own situation, and of the means of fully how dear your interests are to me. Nay, averting the consequences she dreaded, en- turn not pale, madam!' he added, with watchgrossed her wholly, and thus guarded her ful and somewhat irritable pride, softened by deep and sincere affection-' Nay, turn not The first effect of his speech, and of the pale! No word shall you hear from my lips sudden conviction that the manner, more than that may offend your ear or wound your heart. the words, produced, was, as we said, to turn Lady, the ambitious, misproud citizen may her deadly pale; and, while a thousand new have as elevated-perhaps more devotedanxieties and painful considerations crossed ideas of true affection, than the noble, whose her mind, she remained gazing on him so pride and arrogance are his right of birth; long, in silence, that she felt he must see that and may be able to crush his own heart, to he was understood. The silence of her own sacrifice more than life-hope, blessed hope embarrassment then becoming painful to her, itself-to serve the being that he loves. Nay, do as well as to him, the blood rushed up into her you weep?' he continued, seeing the tears roll face, and yet she could not reply; so that both rapidly over the fair cheek of Mary of Burremained completely mute for several mo- gundy. 'Nay, do you weep? Then I have ments, after words had been spoken which, said too much. Yet, hear me a little. I see you agitated-far more agitated than anything At length she answered, 'Oh! Sir Presi- which has passed hitherto should have occadent, if such power has been granted to you, sioned, unless the words we have spoken, by the States, use it nobly, and Heaven will whose import seems but small, may have touched some fine-strung cord within your 'As far, lady, as my poor judgment can ex- heart, and made sadder music than I dreamed tend, I will use it nobly,' replied Albert Mau- of. However, in this land of Flanders I have rice, over whose heart an icy chill had come, now no small power-which may last God he knew not well why. 'But,' he added, 'as knows how long. But fear not that the power I would fain use it for your happiness—be- I do possess will ever be used to thwart one lieving it to be inseparable from that of the wish of your heart. Whatever it may cost people-let me crave a few words with you in me, it shall be employed to serve you with private, that I may ascertain more fully how deep and true attachment. There is-there is,' he added, his emotion almost mastering He spoke slowly and calmly; but, from the his calmness; 'there is one question I would quivering of his lip, it was evident that each ask, which is hard to put, and may be painful word cost him a painful struggle to pronounce. to answer. Yet, let me speak it quickly and

He paused for a moment, and looked down; contrary to the etiquette of her situation; and while his hand became clenched fearfully yet he who requested, she knew, might com- tight, as if in the struggle to suppress some mand; and she felt that, perhaps, it might be deep feelings that would fain have burst forth; better for both that they should be alone. but after a single moment all was again van-After a moment's pause, then, she gave the quished, and he proceeded :-- 'Some months necessary order for her attendants to withdraw have now past since your father's eyes were into the ante-chamber, and then resumed her closed in death; your dominions are invaded, his eyes still bent upon the ground; and for a and your nobles are leaguing together to moment, even after the last of the Princess's snatch one from another the blessing of your suite had quitted the chamber, he remained hand. It is time, lady, that you should make silent, striving to master all the emotions a choice; and although I know no one on all which were agitating his heart. It was a the earth that is worthy of the happiness painful struggle, but at length he succeeded; within your gift, yet, if there be any one to and then raising his head with some degree of whom you can give your heart, I will—I will, proud consciousness in his aspect, he looked —yes! he added more firmly, 'I will do all that mortal man can do, to render you happy

He paused; and although an undefinable but at the same time, believe me-oh, believe were dreams indeed; yet hope-persevering hope-lingered still, and told him, 'If she Albert Maurice. 'Those energies and those love none else, she may still be thine.'

determined; but she still trembled in every to God's will; and I am most anxious to limb; and long, long was it, ere she could wipe out any offence I may have committed, reply. At length she answered :- 'You have, indeed, put to me a question which makes me feel most painfully how different is the station of Princess from the happy and modest retirement of private life. Nay, do not think much has been done already of that kind, by I blame you, sir,-I blame but my hard fate. You are most kind; and, amidst a base and interested crowd, who would fain make me the slave of their wild ambitions, I shall ever his way to Brussels. remember you with gratitude, as the only one who, -who-with more power than all the said no more, and the Princess proceeded. rest to command my fate, was willing to cast 'Yet, sir,' she said, 'I have many fears; self away, and—and to seek my happiness for I know that the Duke of Cleves has not Feeling thus,-believing from my heart that in your generous nature I may perfectly rely,-I answer your question as dear friend and foster-sister, Alice of Imberdistinctly as it is put. There is, I believe, upon the face of the earth but one man to Hannut, that a hundred men, bearing the whom I can conscientiously give my hand. colours of the house of Cleves, have passed 'Tis now near two years ago, that, by my through Brussels; and there is reason to be-father's command, I plighted my faith in lieve they waylay the road from the Rhine.' writing, and pledged thereto a ring, to one, whom I had been taught, during some months young citizen, in the same abstracted manner. of happy intimacy, to look upon as my future lord :- Maximilian, Archduke of Austria---

'And you love him! and you love him!' cried Albert Maurice, starting forward, and, forgetful of all restraint, grasping her firmly by the wrist. The Princess started up alarmed, and a cry of terror at his sudden vehemence had nearly passed her lips. But she stifled it ere it was uttered; and the next moment known, and his son now journeys with hardly Albert Maurice had recovered himself, and was kneeling at her feet.

' Pardon me! pardon me, Princess of Burgundy!' he said. 'Give me—oh, give me The lip of Albert Maurice quivered; but your forgiveness! The dream is goue! the he still retained command over himself, and vision is over! and Albert Maurice, the hum- replied in a low but distinct voice, though, in blest of your subjects, is ready to pour out every tone, the vehement struggle he mainhis blood, to atone for all that he has done tained to master the agony of his heart was amiss. Madam,' he added, rising, 'I have still apparent: - 'To calm those feelings, a sad one. But no more of that; at present slightest apprehension of the result. I will What can I do to sweep all the land. obstacles from before your wishes? Tell me quickly how I can serve you? Let me, at least, work out your happiness, before the memory of the past turn my brain.

Oh, speak not so wildly, sir,' cried Mary. 'You have great powers and noble energies, which will guide you to the height of fame; and yet, I trust, to the height of happiness. Indeed, sir, I cannot speak farther, while you seem so moved.'

'Madam, I am perfectly calm,' replied

powers your Grace is pleased to speak of, Mary of Burgundy's conduct was already may last a longer or a shorter time, according by employing them vigorously in your service. Let me beseech you to speak. Shall I send off immediate messengers to the Archduke?'

'No, no! oh, no!' cried Mary; 'I fear too my kind stepdame, the Duchess Margaret, and my good cousin of Ravenstein; for I hear -for I hear-that the Archduke is already on

'Ha!' cried Albert Maurice; 'ha!' but he only sent forth messengers to forbid his approach to the city, but, also, I hear from my court, who is now with the good Lord of

'Indeed! This must be seen to!' said the 'But your Grace was about to add-

'Merely this, sir,' replied Mary, with calm impressive gentleness that is more touching than any vehemence; 'that the man to whom I believe myself plighted by every tie but the final sanction of the church, is, I am told, on his road hitherward, slenderly accompanied,
—for the avarice of the Emperor is well ten attendants. He has enemies, -strong enemies on the way, -and I leave you to judge, sir, of the feelings that I experience.'

been living in a dream; and, I fear me, when madam, shall be my first effort; and, as I have I come to look upon it steadily I shall find it received timely information, entertain not the I am—if that be not a dream also—President serve you, madam, more devotedly than I of the States-General of Flanders, and armed would serve myself; and the last energies with greater power than any other man in that, possibly, I may ever be able to command, shall be directed to secure your happiness. I have now detained you long. Night wears, and time is precious. I humbly take my leave. May heaven bless you, madam! May heaven bless you! and send you happier days, to shine upon your reign, than those with which it has begun.'

He bowed low, and took two or three steps towards the door, while Mary gazed upon him with eyes in which compassion for all she saw that he suffered, and woman's invariable sympathy with love, called up an unwilling tear.

'Stay, sir, one moment,' she said at length; of another,—he felt his brain reel under the as far as the gratitude of a Princess towards which he could fly for relief. The gone hours a subject can extend, I am grateful to you for were full of reproach, and the approaching all that you have done in my behalf. Believe ones were all bitterness. me, too, that I admire and esteem the great Such were his feelings as he strode along qualities of your mind, and that I will, as far the passages of the Palace at Ghent; and the as in me lies, teach my husband —and she incoherent words that he muttered to himlaid a stress upon the word—'to appreciate self, as he proceeded, showed how terrible your talents and your virtues, and to honour had been their effect already upon his bright and employ them for our common benefit, and powerful mind. 'They have been mur-

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE DRUGGIST'S SILVER BOX.

PAINFUL and terrific as had been the struggle in the bosom of Albert Maurice, while he remained in the presence of the Princess, his feelings had been light and sunshiny, compared with those which he experienced when he found himself alone with the deep gloomthe dull, immoveable despair, which at once thought had an opportunity to rest upon his yet that square—I love not to pass that square, own situation. We have before seen that where they were beheaded.' remorse was already busy in his bosom; and the only shield that guarded him from the soldier, in a tone which again recalled Albert lash of his own reflections had been the Maurice to the present moment. 'As I sat bright surpassing hope of overcoming all the here but now, that evil Prévôt—that Maillotin he loved. But now he had triumphed over others, speaking eagerly of you. His eye fell every enemy—he had overleaped every barrier upon me, and he may chance to know me -he had set his foot upon every obstacle, and, in the end, discovered that she loved another-that all was useless that he had done taken his way towards the prison, where my in vain-that he had forgotten his country and quick, we may come too late.' her rights-that he had forgotten justice and humanity-that he had yielded himself entirely Maurice, roused to the exertion of all his to ambition, and consigned himself to remorse powers by the sudden call upon his energy. for ever—for a dream that was gone. Nor 'You, young man, run as for your life to the was this all; the same deep, fiery, passionate town-house! Bid the commander of the love remained in his heart, but was now burgher guard march a hundred men indoomed, instead of the bright follower of stantly down to Prévôt's prison, near the hope, to become the sad companion of regates. But who have we here?' he added, morse and despair. When he thought of the as a man in breathless haste ran up the steps future, -when she should become the bride into the hall. 'The lieutenant of the Pré-

'it may be the last time that ever I shall have agony of that contemplation; when he thought the power to thank you, as Duchess of Bur- of the past, he felt that the gnawing worm gundy, before I resign my sovereignty with was for ever destined to prey upon his heart. my hand to another. Believe me, then, that There was no refuge for him in all time, to Take this jewel, I beseech you, 'she added, dered in vain,'—he muttered,—'they have 'and wear it ever as a token of my gratitude.' been murdered in vain. Their blood cries up 'Oh, madam!' exclaimed Albert Maurice, to heaven against me. To see her in the as he advanced to receive the diamond she arms of another-oh, God! oh, God! But proffered. He took it slowly and reverentially; she shall be happy. Ves—she shall be happy, but, as her hand resigned it, his feelings overpowered him, and pressing the jewel suddenly and she shall be happy; and I—and I—why, to his heart, he exclaimed, 'I will carry it to there is the grave—that is one resource, at my grave!' Then turning, without farther least!' and suddenly he burst into a low, inadieu, he threw open the door and quitted the voluntary laugh, which made him start even apartment. 'Am I insane,? he thought; 'then I must be speedy, lest the power fail me.' And again muttering disjointed sentences, he proceeded down the great staircase, and was passing through the entrance-hall, without noticing any one, when Matthew Gournay advanced to his side and stopped him.

'There is no time to be lost, sir,' he said;

'let us hasten quick.

'Who are you?' demanded Albert Maurice, gazing vacantly upon him. 'Who are you?

Oh, yes! I had forgot, he added, recalling his thoughts. 'Other things were pressing on my mind. We will go presently, but took possession of his heart, the moment that I must first return to the town-house; and

'You have no time, sir,' replied the old mighty obstacles before him, and winning her du Bac-passed through the hall with several well. At all events, he was silent instantly: but, if I am not very wrong indeed, he has -that the blood he had shed had been shed young lord lies; and, perchance, if we be not

'You speak true-lead on,' cried Albert

Cou?'

imminent peril; and I now think that the news I bring you may be valuable to you.
The prisoner who was made in the marketplace,—the Vert Gallant of Hannut,—men say you owe him something, and would fain repay it. But, if you hasten not your steps, you will come too late. I have done what I can to delay the Prévôt, but he is now speeding on to the prison. His purpose is against the life of the prisoner; and his horses are ready to fly from Ghent for ever.'

Enough, enough!' said Albert Maurice, passing him suddenly and springing down the steps of the palace. The court was soon traversed, and the streets leading towards the gate were threaded by the young citizen and his followers with the speed of light. The active exertion of his corporeal powers seemed to give back to Albert Maurice full command of his mental ones, at least for the time; and though his thoughts were characterised by the darkest and sternest despair, they wandered not from those points to which he strove to bend them, and he seemed revolving eagerly some plan of future conduct. 'Yes, he said, half aloud, as he strode on,—'yes! so shall it be,—so shall it be! If I am in time, he shall conduct the rest; and, ere all be finished, the world may have cause to blood even within this bosom.'

a street, which led into one of those conduct- ceived that the door was not completely ing directly towards the Alost gate. yards farther from the town walls than the held up the light, when the sight that prepoint at which the narrow street he had been sented itself to his eyes was horrible indeed, pursuing entered the other, stood a small stone building, with a few narrow slits in the masonry for windows, known as the Prévôt's prison, in which he lodged any newly arrested been removed from the town-house, appeared prisoners, previous either to their immediate execution or to their removal to some other called him, while his right foot was pressed place of confinement. dark, and likewise solitary, except where, under the projection of a house—the upper stories of which, as was often customary in Ghent, protruded considerably beyond the blood,—a stream of which was still flow-lower ones—stood four or five men, holding ing from his throat,—lay the form of Mailsaddled horses, and conversing together in a low tone.

The impatient stamping of their steeds had prevented them from catching the approaching steps of Albert Maurice and his party; moment they came up, in a tone sufficiently loud for his words to be distinguished, - 'He is very long! I never knew him so long about sword of the dead man, and gazed upon those such a job before!'

'the rest follow me;' and without waiting to and seemingly uninjured, except from a

It, as I live! How now, sir, whom seek notice the short scuffle that ensued, he sprang on towards the Prévôt's prison, and pushed 'You, Sir President,' replied the man, at against the door. It was locked from within, once. 'You once saved me when I was in and his effort to open it was vain. 'Fly to the gate,' he exclaimed, turning to one of his followers: 'bring me a battle-axe from the guard-house. Ho! within there,' he added, striking the hilt of his sword violently against 'Open the door! beware what the door. you do; you cannot escape me; and you shall find my vengeance terrible. Open the door, I say !'

But he spoke in vain: no answer was returned; and the only sound that he even thought he heard, was that of a low groan. After a few moments of painful expectation the man who had been sent to the gate returned, bearing a ponderous axe, and followed by two or three of the soldiers of the guard.

Albert Maurice snatched the weapon from his hands, and in three blows dashed in a large part of the door. The rest was soon hewn down, at least sufficiently to admit the passage of the young burgher and his followers. Entering the small stone hall into which it opened, he caught up a light that had evidently been burning some time untrimmed; and, commanding two or three of those who accompanied him to guard the door, he strode forward rapidly to the mouth of a narrow flight of steps, which led to some cells below the ground. At the entrance of know that there were some drops of Roman one of these dungeons, a lantern had been ood even within this bosom.' placed upon the ground, and was still burn-Almost as he spoke he turned the corner of ing; and Albert Maurice immediately per-Fifty closed. He instantly pushed it open, and but not ungrateful.

Seated upon the side of the straw pallet, which had been his only couch since he had Hugh de Mortmar, as we have previously The street was all heavily upon the body of a man, who, from his dress and appearance, seemed to be one of the jailers in the employ of the Prévôt. A little to the right, surrounded by a pool of lotin du Bac, while the poniard, which, it may be remembered, Albert Maurice had bestowed upon Hugh de Mortmar in the prison of the town-house, now driven tightly in between the gorget plaits and cuirass of the and one was saying to the other, at the very Prévôt's armour, showed at once the manner of his death and the arm which had inflicted it.

The young prisoner held in his hand the who entered with a firm and resolute counten-'Let them be seized,' exclaimed Albert ance, while he pressed down beneath his feet Maurice, the instant his eye fell upon them; the form of the jailer, who was clearly alive, hurried words explained the precise situation in which they all stood. The sight of Albert Maurice and of good old Matthew Gournay was enough to satisfy the young prisoner; and on his part he had only to tell them, that while lying there a few minutes before, thinking of when his captivity might end, he had heard approaching steps, and listened to a low conversation at the door which he felt sure boded him no good. Affecting still to sleep, he remained perfectly quiet while the door was opened and the Prévôt, setting down his lantern on the outside, approached towards him, accompanied by the jailer who had the care of the prison. Their eyes, however, were not so much accustomed to the darkness as his own; and, seeing evidently that the design of the Prévôt was to despatch him, he watched his moment, till the other was stooping over him, and then drove the mations. dagger with which he had been furnished, with the full force of recovered health and strength, under the gorget of the murderer. So hard had he stricken it, however, between the iron plates, that he could not draw it forth again, and he had nothing to trust to but his own corporeal strength in the struggle which succeeded with the jailer.

however, to which he had been subjected in him to full vigour in a shorter time than might otherwise have been required for recovering his health; and the jailer, overground when Albert Maurice forced his way into the place of the young noble's confinement.

In the energy of action Albert Maurice had, for the time, found relief from a part of the now covered with people, busily removing the heavy load that passion and circumstances traces of the evening's festivity. 'It is sad,' had piled upon his head; but the moment he said, with a mournful shake of the head; the necessity of active exertion passed away, the weight returned and crushed him to the earth. He spoke for an instant to the prisoner collectedly and calmly, but gradually his brow grew dark and clouded; and his words became low, harsh, and confined to the body of Ganay had been removed, after those necessary to express his wishes or commands.

The jailer, freed from the tread of Hugh de Mortmar, was placed in the custody of some of those who had now crowded to the spot; and the President, after giving general been examining the appearance of the dead orders to the burgher guard, which came up, and a few whispered directions to Matthew Gournay, took the prisoner by the hand, saying, 'Come, my lord; let us to the townhouse!'

The change which had come over the whole had seen him, was too great to escape the Mortmar, 'He sleeps calm enough, with all ghastly contusion on his forehead. The mo- eyes of Hugh de Mortmar, even at a moment ment that he beheld who it was that entered, when the excitement of a late struggle was Hugh de Mortmar started up, and a few and fresh upon him. Nor did he exactly understand how the young President dared to take the bold step of setting him free at once, when he had before seemed most anxious to proceed with scrupulous caution. He made no observation, however, and followed Albert Maurice into the street. By this time, almost all the respectable citizens of Ghent were in their quiet beds; but a number of those who had been entertained in the market-place were still wandering about, some partially inebriated with ale or mead, some half drunk with excitement and pleasure. A number of these had gathered together amongst the guards and attendants, now collected round the door of the prison; and as Albert Maurice led forth his companion, and the flickering glare of a number of lanterns and torches showed the features of the President to the crowd, he was greeted by loud accla-

> But the smile of bitterness and scorn with which Albert Maurice now heard the vivats of the multitude, contrasted strongly with his demeanour in the morning, and showed how completely the talismanic touch of disappointment had changed to his eyes all the fairy splendours of his fate.

Without a word of reply, he passed through The hard food and the constrained repose, the midst of the crowd—sought the narrowest owever, to which he had been subjected in and darkest way; and, apparently buried in the prison, had perhaps contributed to restore sad thoughts, proceeded with a quick and irregular step towards the town-house, maintaining a gloomy and unbroken silence as he went. He avoided the market-place before matched, had just been cast headlong to the the building as much as possible; and the only words he spoke were uttered when he could not avoid seeing the spot where Imbercourt and Hugonet had died, and which was 'it is sad!' Then turning into the townhouse, he ascended the stairs rapidly, and entered a small withdrawing room by the side of the great hall.

To that very chamber it so happened that the sword of Matthew Gournay had left him lifeless on the payement; and the first object that met the eye of Albert Maurice was the corpse stretched upon a table, while one of his own attendants stood near, as if he had man. The first impulse of the President was to draw back; but the next was the very contrary; and, again advancing, he approached directly to the table, and fixed his eyes upon the face of the corpse, which was uncovered. 'He sleeps calm enough!' he said, drawing demeanour of the young citizen since last he in his lips, and turning partially to Hugh de no place for what we have to say !'

He was then treading back his steps towards the door, when the attendant advanced, and in arms!' cried Hugh de Mortman. 'No evil gave him a packet of papers and a small sil- against him, Sir President! for know, I would ver box, saying, 'These old papers, sir, and sooner bear to my grave the heaviest chains this box, which we conceive to contain poison, that ever shackled man, than raise an arm are all that we have discovered on the dead against one I love so well. body.

small a space?' said Albert Maurice, gazing I have you set out. Tell him from me, Alon the little silver case; 'but tis well! Bring bert Maurice, that his way is beset,—tell him hence the lights, leave the body, and lock the that every artifice will be used to make him turn door. He will not find solitude oppressive, I back by fair means or by foul. But bid him doubt not;' and thus saying, he led the way hasten forward, in spite of all; and you, on into another chamber, to which the servant your part, promise me never to quit him till followed with the key and lights; and the President added farther, as they were set Duke's house in Ghent. down before him, 'Bring wine!'

with the young cavalier, he leaned his brow upon his hand for a moment, and then looked demanded Albert Maurice. up.- 'Give me your pardon, sir,' he said; 'give me your pardon for a short space. I am somewhat ill to-night, and must collect my thoughts before I can speak to you as I ought.'

wine being brought in a few minutes. Albert Maurice filled for both, and drained his own cup to the dregs. 'I have a burning thirst not; but if what you have to tell be really of upon me,' he said, 'but it will soon be importance, let me beseech you to speak it quenched. Now, sir, I can speak. You quickly. have recovered, I trust, your full strength;

As well as e'er I rode in life,' replied Hugh de Mortmar, 'and thank you deeply for your kind intentions.'

'Thank not me,' replied Albert Maurice, gravely, 'for I am about-like a true citizen,' he added, with a bitter smile, 'for I am about you agree to do me a service in return, -not which probably arose from the apathetic calfor giving you your liberty, for you did the lousness of despair. 'As you knew not that he like to me—but for some intelligence I have was dead, you know not that this arm slew him.' to communicate, which may be worth its companions-good soldiers, levied for purposes I know and respect. In an hour's time they will be mounted, and at the Alost gate, from which we have just come. You shall too little to care who takes it from him.

his burning passions at an end. But this is Dowager,—in order to meet Maximilian,

Archduke of Austria.'

'What! my best friend and old companion

'Fear not, my lord,' replied Albert Mau-'Ha! will the means of death lie in so rice. 'For his safety, not for his injury, would you see him safely within the gates of the

'Willingly! most willingly!' replied the When the man was gone, and he was seated young cavalier, rising. 'I am ready to set out!' 'What, without the tidings I have promised?'

'Some other time !' replied Hugh de Mort-

'When I return will do.

'The present moment is yours,' answered the young citizen, gravely. 'Who can say that, by the time you, return, these lips may Hugh de Mortmar bowed his head; and not be closed by a seal that no human hand can ever remove?'

'I trust not,' replied the other, 'I trust

'I will,' replied Albert Maurice, 'I have and this night—that is to say, ere dawn—can no right, nor any wish, to keep you in suspense. ride forth away from the thraldom of this Are you aware that Adolphus, Duke of Gueldres, is dead?'

'Good God!' exclaimed the young cavalier. 'They told me that he was quite well, and leading the forces of Ghent against Tournay. You have, indeed, ended my suspense somewhat abruptly.

'There is still more to come,' said Albert to drive a hard bargain with you, and to make Maurice, with a sort of reckless harshness.

'Ha!' cried the other, instinctively laying weight in gold. Of that hereafter. First, let his hand upon his side, as if to grasp the hilt us speak of the service I require. You have of his sword. 'You—you! Did you shed my at this moment, within the walls of the city, father's blood! Then take heed to yourself, where I have given them employment during Call again for your jailers! Cast me back this evening, some three or four hundred free into the dungeon; for otherwise your blood must answer for that which you have spilt.'

'Such threats,' answered Albert Maurice. ' are worse than vain, to one who loves life have arms that might grace a prince, a horse sides, they are prompted by a mere dream of as noble as ever was bestrode by knight; and the imagination, which I can dissolve in two what I require is this,-that, all other matter or three words. You had never seen the laid aside, you ride forward towards Brussels, Duke of Gueldres from your childhood; no and thence onward, on whatever road you sweet reciprocations of domestic love had may find necessary, -as you will there discover bound your heart to his; you knew that he from the Lord of Ravestein, or the Duchess was victous, criminal, unfeeling.—Nay, frown raised a hand against him.

Doubtless, there is inherent in human of painful playing with the feelings of the young cavalier, in which Albert Maurice inarose from some such cause. His own griefs, however, were too great to suffer his mind to more. dwell long upon anything without weariness; and he tired almost instantly of the writing; and, with a rapid hand, Albert Mau-

'Too much of this!' he added, in the same abrupt tone. 'Be your feelings on those points rational or not, no tie, human or divine, binds you to love or to avenge Adolphus, the bad Duke of Gueldres. Know, that at his instigation the man, whose corpse you saw but now, kindled the flames of Lindenmar, in which the infant heir of Hannut was supposed to have perished; and farther know, that in the act of death, the Duke of Gueldres confessed to me, that he himself carried away the infant, and reared him as his son upon the death of his own child. You will want other proofs to establish the facts—there they are, in writing; and probably these papers which you saw me receive but now, may throw some meet again. farther light upon the matter. We have ticularly at present. Take them with you, and claim your right of birth. Now follow me to the armoury, for I hear your band passing onwards to the Alost gate to wait your coming. Are you strong enough to go?

tidings you have given confound me, and I have not words-

'Here is our way.'

forward to the armoury, which had been col- dead man for some time. lected in the town-house under his own care. him entirely to the papers that he had received the mixture. After which he cast himself in the young citizen strode onward, and saw the a chair, and closed his eyes. Vert Gallant of Hannut equip himself once more in a complete suit of arms. There was same position, without a muscle of his face a degree of joy in the countenance of the being moved; but at length he opened his young heir of Hannut as he did so, -a sort of eyes, looking somewhat fiercely round the new lighting up of that military hope which chamber. was the great inspiration of the day, that 'This is too much!' he exclaimed aloud, not, sir, but hear me.—You know all this; called a melancholy smile even to the lip of and yet, because you believe him to have been Albert Maurice; and he gazed upon him, as your father, you would slay any one that with quick and dexterous hands he clothed his powerful limbs in steel, as an old man on the verge of the tomb might be supposed to misery a desire of seeing others wretched regard a youth setting out upon the flowery when we are wretched ourselves: and the sort path of life, full of all those bright hopes that had passed away from himself for ever.

When it was all done, - 'Your horse,' dulged at a moment when he himself was said the young citizen, 'stands below; but plunged in the gloomiest despair, probably yet one moment. A pass must be written for yourself and the Archduke. Follow me once

In the next chamber were implements for rice traced the necessary order destined to remove all petty obstacles from the path of his princely rival, signed his name below in a bold, free hand, and gave it to his companion with a proud, but bitter smile.

'There,' he said, 'take it, and go forth! and may God speed you on your errand. Forgive me if I have sported with your feelings this night,—which, may be, I have done in some degree, -but there is a potent demon in my heart just now, that strives hard to crush each noble wish and kindly feeling, ere they can rise. Now, farewell!'

'Farewell! farewell!' replied Hugh of Hannut. I may, perhaps, want more information than these papers contain. But we shall

'Perhaps we may,' replied Albert Maurice, neither of us time to examine them more paras the other turned and descended the steps. ticularly at present. Take them with you, 'Perhaps we may,' he repeated, as, after a moment's pause, he heard the trampling of horse, announcing that the other had departed. 'Perhaps we may, in the grave, or, rather, beyond it.'

The young President then returned to the The young cavalier gazed for a moment in chamber in which he had been sitting, and his face, bewildered by all he heard; but then continued for about an hour engaged in writ-replied, 'I am ready! quite ready! For these ing. When he had concluded, he buried his papers I owe you a thousand thanks; but the eyes in his hands for a few moments, and remained plunged in deep thought. Rousing himself, he raised a lamp, and striding across 'No more, no more!' replied Albert Mau- the passages to the room where the corpse of Ganay the druggist lay, he threw open the The young citizen now led his companion door, and gazed upon the countenance of the

Without a word, he then walked back to As they went, the liberated prisoner would the chamber where he had been writing, and fain have asked a thousand questions expla- drawing forth the small silver box that had natory of the strange tidings he had just re- been given him, poured the white powder that ceived; but the answers of Albert Maurice it contained into one of the cups, adding a were brief, and somewhat sharp. Referring little wine from the tankard, and drank off

For several minutes he remained in the

'It has no effect! and I lie here, expecting death without a chance of his approach, while the past haunts me; and there seem voices, crying up for judgment upon me, from yon accursed square. But I will soon end all!' and, starting up, he drew his dagger from the sheath; but, as he did so, something in the word judgment appeared to seize upon his imagination. 'Judgment!' he said - 'judgment! Am I not flying to judgment?' and laying down the dagger on the table, he paused, gazing round with a degree of fearful bewilderment in his eyes, which seemed to show either that his mind was shaken, or that some potent destroyer was mastering the body. 'Judgment!' he repeated. 'Were it not better to wait till I am summoned, -to strive to wipe out the evil,-and to bear the sorrows that God has given as a punishment for all that I have done, and left undone? Judgment! judgment!' But, as he repeated that awful word, his cheek grew deathly pale; cold drops of perspiration stood upon his forehead; his lips became nearly livid: and the rich curls of his dark hair, as if relaxed by the overpowering weakness that seemed coming over his whole frame, fell wild and floating upon his brow.

At first, apparently unconscious of the change that was taking place, he leaned his hand upon the table to steady himself as he stood; but the moment after, two or three sharp shudders passed over his whole frame; and after reeling painfully for an instant, he cast himself back into the chair, exclaiming, in a tone full of despair, indeed, 'It is too late! it is too late!' and he threw himself to and fro in restless agony.

'This is in vain!' he cried at length, opening his eyes. 'This is weak, and empty, and cowardly! I that have lived boldly can surely die as I have lived!' and once more resuming the attitude in which he had placed himself at first, he clasped his hand tight over his eyes, as if to exclude a painful sense of the light. In a moment or two, the hand dropped: but his eyes remained closed; and, after a time, the exhausted lamps, which had now been burning many hours, went out, and all was darkness!

CHAPTER XXXIX. CONCLUSION.

THE rumour which had given to the heart of Mary of Burgundy the glad hope that Maximilian of Austria was already within her territories, had deceived her; and Hugh of Hannut, on arriving at Brussels, found that his princely companion-in-arms was still far from that city. True to the promise he had given, however,-though all his own feelings would have conducted him at once to the forest of Hannut, wherein he had led a life of such adventure and interest, and to the mansion Maurice was discovered, intelligence arrived where her he loved now dwelt, and in which his happiest days had been passed, - he advanced directly towards Cologne; and not far on the hither side of the Rhine, met the small party which accompanied the son of the Emperor. It were as tedious as an old chronicle to tell the joy of Maximilian at the coming of his friend, or to detail all the efforts that were made by the Duke of Cleves to deter or prevent the Archduke from pursuing his journey towards Ghent. The private information he had received, and the armed force which now accompanied him on his way, rendered all efforts either to alarm or impede him vain; and the rapid progress made by the French arms had so convinced the people of Flanders that a single leader, whose fortunes were linked for ever to that of the Princess of Burgundy, was absolutely necessary to give vigour and direction to their efforts, that all attempts to stir them up to oppose the alliance with the Austrian Prince would have been fruitless.

One event, however, had happened in the meantime, which completely cooled throughout Flanders that ardour for innovation, and that desire of democratic rule, which is one of the evils consequent upon every struggle for increased liberty, whether just or unjustthe wild spray which the waves of freedom cast beyond their legitimate bound.

The morning after the return of Albert Maurice to Ghent, some of his attendants, finding the door of his bed-chamber open, entered, and discovered that he had never been in bed; and, the alarm spreading, he was soon after found, seated in the chair in which he had been writing, cold, stiff, and dead.

Of the letters which were cast upon the table before him, one was addressed to the Princess, and one to his uncle; and both distinctly alluded to his intention of destroying himself. Left suddenly without a leader, pressed by a powerful enemy, and encumbered with the management of a state, all the springs and wheels of which they themselves had disarranged, the people of Ghent began to ask themselves what they had gained by pressing exaction and discontent beyond the mere recovery of their rights and privileges. The simplest among them saw that they had gained nothing and lost much; and the more clear-sighted discovered that, in carrying their efforts beyond the straightforward object which they had proposed at first, they had only made the government of the state an object of contention to bold and ambitious party leaders,—a race of men who, for the purpose of success, must always necessarily prolong that confusion and anarchy, which is more baleful than the worst of tyrannies; and who, when success is obtained, must end in tyranny to uphold their power.

The very day that the death of Albert that the armies of France, marching on from the side of Cassel, had burned some villages within four leagues of Ghent; and the Council of the States, confused, terrified, and surprised, without chief, without union, and without resource, proceeded in a body to the palace; and resigning at the feet of the Princess the authority they had usurped, demanded her orders and directions, in the imminent peril to which the state was exposed. It was then that Mary of Burgundy made that famous answer, which has been transmitted to us by almost every historian who has mentioned her name; but it was in sorrow, not in anger, that she spoke; and the tears were in her eyes, when-after hearing the details of a ruined country, an invaded territory, the rich harvests of Flanders reaped by strange husbandmen while they were green, her frontier fortresses taken, and her troops proving false -she replied to the subjects, whose turbulence and discontent had fostered, if not caused, all the evils they had recapitulated :- 'You have banished my best friends, and slain my wisest counsellors, and now what can I do to deliver you?

But misfortune had taught the people of Ghent their own errors, and the excellence of her they had so basely outraged. The news that the Archduke of Austria, the long betrothed husband and the favoured lover of Mary of Burgundy, was advancing with rapid steps towards Ghent, spread as much joy through the city as if the tidings had been of some personal good fortune to each individual citizen. The gates of Ghent were now no longer guarded, except against the common enemy. The Duke of Cleves quitted the city in haste; and joy and satisfaction spread through all ranks when the cavalcade which escorted the Archduke wound on towards the palace. It was remarked, however, that nearly five hundred of the horsemen that accompanied him-and those, surpassing all the rest in military array and demeanourwere adorned with a green scarf, while the banner that floated over them bore the arms of Hannut-Argent, a green tree proper; and that the knight who led this band of élite. though his beaver was now up, and his face exposed, was clothed from head to foot in the green armour of the Vert Gallant of Hannut.

Little more requires to be said. It is well known to every one, how gladly Mary of Burgundy herself saw the arrival of Maximilian; and there is every reason to believe that the old chronicler spoke the truth, when, in describing their first meeting, he said,—'Si parfaict liesse fut oncques logée en cœur de parfaict amant, elle fut trouvée ce jour en l'assemblement de ces deux jouvenceaux.'

Nor did the heart of Hugh de Hannut beat less highly, when, standing beside his princely friend, he, too, claimed his fair bride, Alice of Imbercourt. Still, the dead were to be mourned, and many sorrows were to be forgotten; but they were sorrows which drew the hearts of the living closer together.

A gleam of sunshine shone out at last upon the days of the good old Lord of Hannut; and casting from him the studies which—§ fanciful or real—had soothed his griefs by occupying his mind, he passed his latter years in rejoicing over the recovery of so noble and so dear a son.

On the nineteenth of August, 1477, Mary of Burgundy gave her hand to Maximilian of Austria; and the rich territories, which so many princes had coveted, and for which France had played so base and subtle a game, passed away into another house. The years of that fair princess herself were few; but when she gazed smiling upon her husband and her children, she was wont to thank God that she had not looked into that fatal book, which might have given her an insight into her future destiny; and that in the happiness of the present she could see no ill to be anticipated for the future.

Alice of Imbercourt, soon after her marriage, retired from the city to the dwelling of her husband's father; and though her deep affection for Mary of Burgundy still continued unabated, she never more made the court her abode.

When, at length, the fatal accident happened, which caused the death of her fair foster-sister, she flew eagerly to soothe her couch of sickness; but she never entertained, for a moment, those hopes of her recovery, which all the others around indulged for several days. She it was who prepared the mind of the Archduke for the death of her he loved. She closed her eyes, and then returned to her own dwelling, and resumed the duties of her station.

The people of the country declared that Alice was not surprised by the event which had occurred, being forewarned by the previous knowledge of the future which she had obtained; and the old writers assert, most seriously, that the horoscope of Mary of Burgundy, as it was drawn at her birth, was fulfilled to the most minute particular. As no one, however, saw this horoscope but Alice of Imbercourt,—at least, before the latter events of Mary's life took place,—and as Alice carefully abstained from ever mentioning the subject, it is more than probable that the love of the marvellous, so prevalent in those days, adapted the prediction to the facts long after they occurred.

THE END.

Edinburch Annual !

WARNE'S STAR SERIES.

In this Series, from time to time will be issued a very popular edition of well-known Books, many of them copyright, and published at prices, united with style and completeness, hitherto unequalled.

ONE SHILLING VOLUMES.

Stiff picture wrappers; or cloth gilt, 1s. 6

I	Daisy.	ELIZABETH WETHERELL.
2	Daisy in the Fie	ld
3	Nettie's Mission.	ALICE GRAY.
4	Stepping Heaven	ward. E. PRENTISS.
5	Willow Brook.	ELIZABETH WETHERELL.
6	Sceptres and Cro	wns, and The Flag of Truce.	wns, and The Flag
	Dunallan.	GRACE KENNEDY.
8	Father Clement.	GRACE KENNEDY.
14	From Jest to Ear	nest. Rev. E. P. ROE.
	Mary Elliot.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
16	Sydney Stuart.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
17	Picciola.	X. B. SAINTINE.
18	Hope Campbell.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
	Horace and May	. CATHERINE D. BELL.
20	Ella and Marion.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
	Kenneth and Hu	igh.
	FOLIAGE WE WAS	CATHERINE D. BELL.
22	Rosa's Wish.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
23	Margaret Cecil.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
	The Grahams.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
25	Home Sunshine.	CATHERINE D. BELL.
-5 e6	What Katy did	at School.
		SUSAN COULIDGE.
27	Urbane and his	Friends.
0		Mrs. E. PRENTISS.

G V O LI O ML LI D.
or cloth gilt, 1s. 6d.
30 Aunt Jane's Hero. Mrs. E. PRENTI	ss.
31 Aunt Ailie. CATHERINE D. BEI
32 What Katy Did. Susan Cooling
33 Grace Huntley. Mrs. S. C. Har	.I.,
34 Merchant's Daughter. Mrs. S. C. Har
35 Daily Governess. Mrs. S. C. Han	L. of Flower of the Femily.
Mrs. E. PRENTI	ss.
39 Madame Fontenoy.	- 20
By the Author of "Sydonie's Dowr	7.
41 Toward Heaven. Mrs. E. PRENTI	55.
42 Little Camp on Eagle Hill.
45 Prince of the House of By the Revol
46 The Pillar of Fire. INGRAHA	M.
47 The Throne of David.
48 The Admiral's Will. M. M. Be
49 Sylvia and Janet. A. C.	D.
That Lass o' Lowrie's.
FRANCES H. BURNE
53 Cloverly. Mary A. High
54 Alec Green. By SILAS K. HOCKI
55 Sweet Counsel. By SARAH TYTL	ER.
56 The Milestones of Life.
57 Little Women. By Louisa M. Alco	TT.
58 Little Wives. Ditto.
50 Barriers Burned Away, Rev. E. P. R	OE.
60 Opening a Chestnut Burr. Ditte	).
61 Uncle Tom's Cabin. By Mrs. STO	WE.

EIGHTEENPENNY VOLUMES,

Stiff picture wrappers; or cloth gilt, 2s.

9 Wide, Wide World.

ELIZABETH WETHERELL.

10 Queechy. ELIZABETH WETHERELL.

11 Melbourne House.

ELIZABETH WETHERELL.

28 Wearyfoot Common. Leitch Ritchie. 29 Sydonie's Dowry. By the Author of "Denise."

12 Drayton Hall. ALICE GRAY.
23 Say and Seal. ELIZABETH WETHERELL.

13 Say and Seal. ELIZABETH WETHERELL. 36 The Lamplighter. Miss Cummins. 37 Helen. MARIA EDGEWORTH.
43 Ellen Montgomery's Bookshelf.

44 Old Helmet. ELIZABETH WETHERELL and Crooked Ways. Mrs. H. B. Paull.

52 Englefield Grange. Mrs. H. B PAULL 62 Little Women and Little Wives. Louisa M. Alcorr.

THE COMPANION LIBRARY.

TWO SHILLING VOLUMES,

In large fcap. 8vo, picture boards.

71 Victor Lescar.

74 Home, Sweet Home.

72 Artiste.

95 Frances.

101 Hirell.

96 A Fight with Fortune.

98 The Queen of Bohemia.

99 Robin Gray.

103 Harvest of Wild Oats,

100 For Lack of Gold.

105 Love that Kills.

106 Cruel London.

4	4 The Two Cousins.	SIDNEY S. HARRIS
20	O Sylvester Sound.	H. Cockton
26	6 The Love Match.	H. COCKTON
29	Walter Goring.	ANNIE THOMAS
30	On Guard.	ANNIE THOMAS
36	6 Love's Conflict. I	LORENCE MARRYAT
37	carrett abattabe AA
38		LOBENCE MARRYAT
39		LOBENCE MARRYAT
40
18		LORENCE MARRYAT.
41	Nelly Brooke. F	LORENCE MARRYAT.
43	The Sutherlands.	SIDNEY S. HARRIS,
44	Rutledge.	SIDNEY S. HARRIS.
45		SIDNEY S. HARRIS.
47		LORENCE MARRYAT.
48		LORENCE MARRYAT.
49	wild Files
50		LORENCE MARRYAT.
51	The Girls of Fevers
(LES	FAIRNIE A VIMINE F	LOBENCE MARRYAT.
52	The Season Ticket.	SAM SLICK.
53	The Mummy.	Mrs. Loudon.
54	The Chasseur d'Afri	que.
55	Mho Tifo Cuandana	Col. WALMSLEY.
57	The Life Guardsman George Geith. Mr	s. J. H. RIDDELL.
58	added a second dispersion of	rs. J. H. RIDDELL.
59		s. J. H. RIDDELL.
60	The Rich Husband.	s. o. II. MIDDELL.
	Mr	s. J. H. RIDDBLL.
61		s. J. H. RIDDELL.
62	Far above Rubies. M
63		s. J. H. RIDDELL.
65		s. J. H. RIDDELL,
66		s. J. H. RIDDELL.
67	Race for Wealth. Mr	s. J. H. RIDDELL.

68 Mad Dumaresq.

69 No Intentions.

70 Bright Morning.

76 The Earl's Promise.
Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
77 Mortomley's Estate.
Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
78 Frank Sinclair's Wife. Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
79 The Ruling Passion.
Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
80 My First and Last Love.
Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
81 Gabriel Conroy. BEET HARTE.
82 Above Suspicion. Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
83 The Sun-Maid. MARIA M. GRANT.
84 A Horrid Girl.
By the Author of "Margaret's Engagement."
85 Clytie. Joseph Hatton.
86 Bitter Sweets. Joseph Hatton.
87 Not in Society. Joseph Hatton.
00 777 27
88 Tallants of Barton. JOSEPH HATTON. 89 In the Lap of Fortune.
Joseph Hatton.
90 Valley of Poppies. Joseph Hatton.
91 Christopher Kenrick. Joseph Hatton.
CHILD TOPHET MEHITICK, JOSEPH HATTON.

92 Now or Never. M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. 93 The Sylvestres. M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. 91 Sweet and Twenty. MORTIMER COLLINS.

75 Joy after Sorrow. Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.

MARIA M. GRANT.

MARIA M. GRANT.

Mrs. J. H. RIDDRLL.

Bedford Street, Strand.

FLORENCE MARRYAT.

FLORENCE MARRYAT.

MARIA M. GRANT.

Inta

MORTIMER COLLINS.

MORTIMER COLLINS.

JOSEPH HATTON.

C. GIBBON.

FLORENCE MARRYAT.

W. G. WILLS

C. GIBBON.

J. SAUNDERS.

WARNE'S READABLE BOOKS.

Price 1s. each, picture wrapper.

- 1 SIR HARRY AND THE WIDOWS. By H. CORBET.
- 2 SIGNAL ROCKET (THE): A Tale of the Thirty Years' War.
- 3 MY FIRST LOVE. By Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
- 4 MY LAST LOVE. By Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.
- 5 THAT LASS O' LOWRIE'S. By F. H. BURNETT.
- 6 SEVENTY YEARS AGO. By M. Pollard.
- 7 THEO. A Love Story, By F. H. BURNETT.
- 8 MY STAR. A Novel. By BERTHE VADIER.
- 9 ABEL DRAKE'S WIFE. By John Saunders.
- 10 INTO THIN AIR. By J. CHILD.
- 11 SCARLET SHAWL. By R. JEFFERIES.
- 12 NATALIE. By Frances Hodgson Burnett.
- 13 LORD LYNN'S WIFE. By the Author of "Lady Flavia."

POPULAR HANDY MANUALS.

In crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

THE YOUNG WOMAN'S BOOK.

A Gathering of Useful Information in Household Matters, Taste, Duties, Study, &c., &c. With Practical Illustrations.

In crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

BEST OF EVERYTHING.

By the Author of "Enquire Within." Containing 1800 Useful Articles on how to obtain "The Best of Everything," with a Special Calendar for the Cook and Gardener for each Month.

In crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d., cloth gilt.

HOME DOCTORING:

A Guide to Domestic Medicine and Surgery. By a Member of the Royal College of Surgeons (England). With Coloured Plates.

Warne's Chandos Classics.

Three New Volumes.

In large crown 8vo, price 1s. 6d. sewed, new Picture Wrapper. Or 2s. each, cloth gilt.

THE ITALIAN NOVELISTS. THE GERMAN NOVELISTS. THE SPANISH NOVELISTS.

Translated from the Originals, with Critical and Biographical Notices,

BY THOMAS ROSCOE.

In crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

The CHANDOS LIBRARY Editions of ROSCOE'S ITALIAN NOVELISTS. ROSCOES' GERMAN NOVELISTS. ROSCOE'S SPANISH NOVELISTS.

Printed on a superior paper, and elegantly bound.

WARNE'S CHANDOS CLASSICS.

From The Baily Telegraph.

"Perhaps the most acceptable volumes in the library of a poor student might be these recent additions, which are designed to gain a wider popularity — Roscoe's 'Italian,' German,' and 'Spanish Novelists;' three volumes that need no fresh commendation, except for the enterprise which has brought them into so conveniently compact and cheap a form. The prose fictions of Italy, from the 'Novelle Antiche,' to those of Robustiano Gironi; the tales treasured in the heart of the great German nation, of 'Howleglass,' 'Reynard the Fox,' 'The Horned Siegfried,' 'Henry the Lion,' 'Doctor Faustus,' and others of older origin, down to the equally national inventions of the Grimms, Schiller, Musæus, Tieck, Langbein, and Engel; and the Spanish fables to which all Europe is more or less consciously indebted, will please the many for a season, and delight in perpetuity the few."

LONDON: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., BEDFORD STREET, STRAND.